They had the smallest flower girl that ever was. I think she was not more than three years old. She was radiant in a charming little white frock made for her in Turkey. Yes, and it had the smallest buttons that ever were put on a little girl's dress. I know, because the dress got spotted coming to church in an automobile—yes, they came in automobiles; this was no cheap wedding—and the wedding had to halt while the dress went to the cleaner, who did a hurry-up job on it. And when it came back good as new, everybody had on white kid gloves, new and stiff, and I had to button the little girl's dress. The mother of the little girl grew fearful that the little tot would have stage fright when she started down the church aisle, but she did not. As soon as the procession entered the church, the little girl at the very head, the mother pointed to me at the other end of the church, and whispered, "Take the basket of flowers to the minister." And the little girl never saw but one man in that church, and I was that man. She walked a straight line down the aisle, and came to the pulpit smiling and determined. She arrived.

A Messenger Boy.

She might have illustrated the theme of this little chat. But even more than I recall her, I have in my mind's eye another person who appeared that evening. After the reception, and while the refreshments were serving, the bridal party sat enthroned in the front of the vestry facing all Armenian America, and with them sat the minister, and the great-grandfather, the old patriarch of all. While we were seated there in more of state than often comes to people, in came a messenger boy with a telegram for the bride and groom. They tried to stop him at the door, but he walked in. An usher halted him, or tried to, but he had his eye on the happy couple, and strode down the aisle. He was larger than the little girl of whom I have been telling you, yet not so much larger after all. The two biggest things about him were his A. D. T. cap, and a red boil on the back of his neck. He did not remove either of them as he approached the bridal party. He handed over the yellow envelope with one dirty hand, and presented his book for signature with the other. He stood eyeing the whole affair, not with disapproval, but with conscious superiority. Marrying and giving in marriage, flying from Armenia and making a new home in a strange land were nothing to him. He was there delivering a message, and he delivered it.

An Angry-Looking Boil.

The boil on his neck was an angry-looking affair. When I was a boy all boys had occasional boils on the back of their necks. They came in the spring, and were alleged to be worth five dollars each to any boy. However, lest a boy should become too valuable there was fed to him sulphur and molasses—did you ever have any of it?—to clear out his blood. This boy had not outgrown those good old unhygienic days. The bride and groom may not have seen the boil. The audience probably sat too far back to notice it. But from my throne at the end of the receiving line, I saw it in defile, and it added to the boy's picturesqueness. It was a suggestion of a motor behind the brain, giving it stern determination.

But it may not have been the boil at all that furnished the momentum. It may have been merely the boy himself, who had simple knowledge that it was his business to deliver the message, and get a receipt, and who meant to do it if there were as many devils in Worms as tiles on the roof, or as many boils on the neck as there are freckles on the noses of the returning summer girls. It was no concern of his who married or gave in marriage—it was his job to deliver the message and get a receipt.

He Delivers the Message.

I have been thinking of that boy in these closing days of the summer vacation. I am returning to take up my work, and so are the other pastors. The delivery of the message—that is the great thing. To have a message, and to know what it is and where to take it, that is the great task of the preacher. The messenger boy was no beauty, but he had in him some of the stuff of which heroes are made, and great preachers also. He had a message to deliver, and he delivered it.

WHY WE LIKE THE PSALMS

BY J. A. ADAMS.

When I take up my Bible in the morning it is not merely to "have prayers," but to get strength for the day's work and light for its difficulties, and I find myself drawn with continuous interest to the psalms. My explanation is that the psalms are at once so human and so divine. I talk over the telephone wires to a man on the other side of the city or in a neighboring town. But here is this man in the "psalm country" talking to me across lands and ages. Since his day empires have come and gone and revolutions swept over the earth like troubled visions of the night; the world has changed again and again, and yet this poet of Israel talks to us as if nothing had changed. He gets nearer to us than any poet of Greece or Rome, or any man of song that ever breathed upon time the rhythm of his verse. We feel his heart throbs, and there is a fire in his mind that kindles, a light in his thought that neither goes out nor dims with age; it shines right into our inmost souls.

A True Brother Man.

There may be disputes about who he was, but none about what he was. He was a brother man, that is certain. He was as human as you can find them. There is nothing artificial or conventional about him. He is not posing, or talking to the "galleries," or to scholars, or high or low, or rich or poor. He is talking himself, what is in him, and there is much in him. He is also much in contact with the world about him. Life touches him at every point. He is a man in trouble and in tears. He has enemies and conflicts and there are days when all the waves roll over him, and other days when he is at the top and shouting victory. This man also has conflicts within, his doubts and fears, times when his feet almost slip, when life's great questions surge around him in ghastly confusion, and there are other times when he stands on a rock and faces all situations with a smile of triumph. So human is he that whatever our experiences, he says to us, "I have been there."

Poetry of the Divine Life.

But this is not all of the man who wrote psalms. Back of him is God. Or rather in him is the voice of God, above him is the rule of God and around him are the ways of God. His psalms are the poetry of the divine life in man. He is a sinner, but a forgiven sinner, and God gets the glory. He is weak but also strong and the strength comes from God. He has enemies, but God is his friend and that settles the matter. He can fight battles, but it is God who teaches him how to fight. There are battles which are lost, but it is God's cause, and therefore the battle is not lost. In all the wail of sorrow which gives pathos to the psalms or in the outbreaks of anguish which sometimes make them so tumultuous there is no lost cause. He wins victories, but they are God-given. His joys, his happiness, his hopes, all run back to the divine source. "All my springs are in thee," he exclaims.

A Present God.

Everywhere he sees God. The men who think that a "present God" is a discovery of the modern man have not read this man of the psalms. Nothing was further from his thoughts than that God was outside of his creation, or that he had wound it up and was sitting down and looking at it go. God was always around, and sometimes so near that he made the psalmist's flesh quiver. That is why his words so thrill us now.

He saw nature, wondered at its marvels and confessed its fascinations and its power. But God was greater than nature. It was servant of the Divine Ruler, not his master, nor something with such a set program that he cannot touch it without upsetting the universe. There was room for prayer. And unless we can pray how long will we continue to praise? If we cannot ask God to do anything for fear of overturning all law and order, how can we praise him for doing something? There will be nothing for Thanksgiving day but to play ball and eat turkey, and the preachers will talk politics and discuss the divorce problem. Atheism will not be any the less atheism because we call it science or progress or modern thought.

Psalmist an Optimist.

It was because the man of the psalms saw God in power that he could be so thankful for what was going to be. He had his very dark times, we shudder when we read about them now, but he could always see light ahead. He looked down the ages and proclaimed victories. And so it is now. Things are not as they should be, but faith in God says that they are going to be better. A day or worship is a proclamation of God, and along with it gratitude for the past and hope for the future.

Thirteen thousand three hundred and fifty-two families in Chicago were aided by the United Charities in 1911, according to the annual report of the organization. The report, which covers the twelve months ending September 30, 1911, shows 3,000 more cases were attended than the year before, an increase of 30 per cent. This, however, is not regarded with any alarm, considering the remarkable increase in the population of the city during that period. The work done, however, is asserted to be the biggest year in the history of the organization. "Neighborly service" was rendered to 1,876 homeless ones during the year, or 667 more than the year before. The Elizabeth McCormick memorial fund during 1911, acting through the United Charities, cared for 1,157 sick babies in nine fresh air tents.

THE HIGH CALLING

His gestures were wide and conveyed tender invitation. He spoke only a few moments more and ended abruptly. Old Peshlekietsetti gently dropped a root of dowegie bush on the almost extinct fire. The coals burst into a new flame and the light flared up again, showing to Felix, Helen's wondering face framed in the opening fold of the wagon cover, while Mrs. Douglas close by her was listening with sympathetic attention deepened into reverent surprise when Elijah Clifford with his hands over his knees, his head bowed, prayed the evening prayer in a spirit that seemed to proclaim another man from the one they had known during the day. And then another hymn in which all were asked by Miss Gray to join. It all smote Felix with a feeling of wonder, it was so new and unusual to his experience. But to Masters and Miss Gray and Clifford it was the regular daily habit of their lives, as common and necessary to them as it was for the tourist crowd looking on to close the day's life with a heavy dinner of seven courses and bridge whist into the next morning. The last glimpse Walter had of Van Shaw as he moved off towards his own wagons was the look he cast at Miss Gray again and then transferred to the canvas that covered the chuck wagon where Helen and her mother sat talking over the strange events of the day and its strange ending.

The next day was a severe experience for old desert travelers. The wind blew almost a gale. The sand drifted like snow and the midday meal was taken standing, everyone eating as best he could, standing up, and making no attempt at the setting of a table or the formality of a regular meal.

Late in the afternoon the grey rock of Oraibi showed through the whistling sand storm. The wagons halted a little while by the Oraibi Wash before making the last miles through the difficult sand hillocks at the foot of the cliff. And it was during this resting period that word came to Masters from one of the Hopis who had a corn field on the Wash that recent rains at Oraibi had so damaged the wagon trail leading to the top that it would be impossible to drive up. All visitors and tourists must walk up the foot trail.

"That means that Helen can't get to the village. It will be a great disappointment," said Mrs Douglas.

It was on the tongue of Felix Bauer to suggest a plan for carrying Helen up the trail on one of the camp cots when Van Shaw struck in.

"Pardon me, Mrs Douglas, but it will be an easy thing to carry Miss Douglas up the trail on a camp cot. Four of us can do it easily. Just put some tent poles under the sides and let the two behind rest the poles on their shoulders and the two in front carry lower. In that way I'm sure we can get Miss Douglas to the top without any inconvenience to her. It would be a shame to come all this distance and eat all this dirt and miss the real thing after all."

"I don't want to miss it, of course," Helen faltered, looking at the group of young men, Walter, Felix, Van Shaw and his two friends. "But I'm giving a lot of trouble and I'm afraid I'm a nuisance."

"Then we will abate it by carrying you up there," said Van Shaw smiling, and Helen smiled back at him, to Felix Bauer's rage. The whole thing was getting to be torture to him. And it all intensified his determination to have a plain talk with Mrs. Douglas. The opportunity for it was not easy. Mrs. Douglas was close by Helen nearly every moment. The camp duties were many and the little company was of necessity grouped close together during the march. But Bauer with his regular stock of dogged patience bided his time, sure it would come.

Camp was pitched that night at the foot of the Oraibi trail. Almost as soon as the wagons were located Van Shaw came over to Mrs. Douglas carrying a cot.

"We've got an extra cot, Mrs. Douglas, and it won't take any time to fix that litter. We can use some of our tent poles. I'll be glad to fix the thing up in the morning."

Mrs. Douglas thanked him quietly, and Helen expressed her gratitude.

"Oh, I wouldn't miss seeing the sight tomorrow for anything. Isn't it wonderful. That rock? How weird it all is. Why, you can hardly tell where the rock begins and the houses leave off. Just to think of seven or eight hundred people living up there all these centuries keeping up these queer customs. And oh, look! What is that?"

A line of Indian women filed past up the trail about twenty-five feet apart, each one carrying on her back a large clay water jar. They did not walk, they trotted along in a tireless steady stride that spoke of centuries of training before them. The weight of the jars was not far from thirty pounds.

Masters was passing Helen's wagon.

"That's woman's rights," he said gravely. "The water supply at Oraibi for centuries has been jars on the backs of women. You must get used to thinking of seven hundred people dependent on the daily trips of these women for all the water used on top of that rock for washing, cooking, drinking. The women of Oraibi also have the right of building the houses the men live in. They are the masons, while the men are the dressmakers. And there are people who would like to keep these women perpetually at these tasks, they say it is so 'picturesque.'"

"I was just going to say that myself," said Helen.

Masters smiled sadly. "Look at the mothers in Oraibi tomorrow. See what heathenism has done for them." He passed on and Van Shaw who had stared at Masters as he spoke said to Helen—"They're queer beggars, ain't they. But I don't believe in trying to change them. They belong here. Might as well let 'em go on the way they've been going the last thousand years."

Helen looked at him with the first feeling she had had of possible distrust or dislike. Van Shaw had spoken just as he really felt, and Helen saw a brief ways into his real character. But as she looked again at the winding figures steadily trotting up the steep path, she had a momentary doubt in her own mind as to the ultimate wisdom of Masters and Clifford in trying to change the century old customs and habits of these desert people.

The day of the snake dance at Oraibi dawned strangely with a heavy shower.

"They're getting their answer to their prayer before they offer it," said Mr. Douglas to Clifford as they sat up on their rugs and listened to the downpour on the tent.

"It has no effect on them," replied Clifford. "The snake dance means a prayer for rain for the whole season. This rain the poor devils believe is an answer to their prayer made two years ago. It's a little late in getting here but every drop of water between the two dances is so accounted for."

By the middle of the forenoon it had cleared up and the two parties, increased by other tourist crowds that had come in during the night, proceeded to climb the trail into Oraibi.

Van Shaw and his two friends in spite of the rain had got up early and finished making the litter. When the moment came for Helen to be transferred to it there was an embarrassing halt and the young men eyed one another. Felix was determined to be one of the carriers and Walter was bound to be another. Van Shaw seemed to take for granted that as he was the one who had suggested the affair he should be another. The two friends from Pittsburg protested that they would be desolate if not allowed to help.

Felix and Walter had gone to the head of the cot and seized the ends of the tent poles and Van Shaw had stepped up to one of the poles at the other end when Esther, who perhaps sensed some electricity in the air not caused by the recent thunder storm, said to Paul:

"You take hold with Mr. Van Shaw, Paul, and let Mr. Coleman and Mr. Calder take their turn later. The trail looks very steep. I'm sure you will need to be relieved occasionally."

They started accordingly and Helen laughingly complimented her cavaliers as they picked up the cot and after several trials discovered the most effective way of handling it.

The trail was bounded on one side by the Oraibi cemetery. The recent rains had washed some of the bodies out of their graves made in the loose gravel of the steep hill. The trail wound up sharply, disclosing at every turn some new marvel of the limitless expanse below. A Hopi came out on a ledge far above them and chanted his song to the sun. Every step brought the party nearer the queer built houses and the kivas with their projecting ladders. Other visitors and tourists were on the trail in front and the progress was slow. Several stops were made and changes occurred in the order of carriers, but when the top of the rock was reached, Masters, who with Mrs. Masters and Miss Gray were close behind the litter, suddenly exclaimed, "There is Talavenka!" pointing to the roof of the first house fronting the trail. A Hopi maiden, distinguished by her whorl of hair as unmarried, stood by the ladder, smiling down at the party.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

NOT AN UNREASONABLE LAMENT

A discouraged leader of a woman's club asked me the other day to write something about the irresponsibility of certain women in organized work. She said she felt thoroughly disheartened, because the absolutely reliable woman was so hard to find—that her price was indeed beyond rubies; sometimes she felt driven to the conclusion that the man in the Bible who said, "I go, sir," and went not, must have been a woman! This was after a trying season with several members of her club who had promised her to write papers, or to be on her program, and who, one after another, had failed her when the time came.

This page is not in the habit of dwelling on the shortcomings of women, yet it would not be worthy of its name if it were not willing at times to inflict the wounds of a faithful friend—so it must be confessed that there are some grounds for the lament of the club leader.

Forms of Irresponsibility.

There is the woman who joins the society under an impulse of enthusiasm and good fellowship, and as long as the programs are entertaining (without her help, generally), and the social feature delightful, she is regular in her attendance; but when the evil days of lukewarmness, of indifference, of falling-off of the weak come, then she drops her membership and seeks solace in some new field of organized effort. How often a faithful few keep the torch of missionary zeal aflame among the women of a church, or even of a whole community! In a certain church, for more than a year, only three women held their monthly meetings, and kept the missionary spirit alive there; now they are privileged to see the fruits of their fidelity, for they have one of the best auxiliaries in the state, numbering more than seventy-five women.

Unwillingness to Bear Common Burden.

Or this irresponsibility may take the form of seeming faithfulness to an organization, but of unwillingness to bear a share in its common burdens. Is it fair, after you have elected your president and secretary and treasurer, to feel that you have done your whole duty when you have cast your ballot for them and leave them to bear the burden of the year's work alone? The ideal president is not one who does all the work herself—her main function is to inspire others to do it. Her motto is, "Ask, and it shall be given you,"—and if you persistently refuse her appeals for help, you are failing in fidelity to her and the cause she represents.

Most Aggravating.

Here is a form of irresponsibility that is most aggravating. A number of women meet, or a number of clubs meet, and pass a series of fine resolutions—say to get a woman on the board of trustees of some state institution, or to advance school suffrage among women, and pledge their clubs to promote the good cause in their respective localities—and then go back to their homes, and straightway forget what manner of force they have set in motion, and leave their hapless officers and committees to wrestle alone with the legislative powers that be. The special committee appointed for the work of course bears the brunt of the battle; but it has the right to expect the loyal support of all women in the organization who have voted for the measure.

The Woman Who Refuses to Vote.

You cannot fail to note a trying form of irresponsibility in the woman who declines to express herself, either by word or vote, when some resolution is before her society. Of course, I do not allude to matters where the vote is merely perfunctory, but when things of real moment are at stake. We need to cultivate intelligent convictions, and vote either for or against any difficult question. I sometimes think that the habit of voting in the negative is one that should be more largely emphasized in women's organized work. We are too apt to throw all responsibility for action on a few, and then, if affairs do not turn out prosperously, to say virtuously, "I never approved of that—I did not vote for it,"—forgetting that if you do not vote against a motion you vote for it, for silence gives consent.

An Abandoned Prerogative.

But the worst form of irresponsibility among women is a certain changeableness of mind, both in business and organized work. The old fiction that it is a woman's prerogative to change her mind is a thing of the past among intelligent, up-to-date women, yet we see persistent survivals of it, even at this good day. Hardly any one would claim it as a right now, but it is an unconscious result of long years of dependence, and being set apart, not only as different from men, but as essentially inferior to them.

While women are so large a factor in the business world to-day, with fully seven millions of them engaged in all of the three hundred wage-earning occupations except nine, yet it is within the memory of some now living when the home was practically her only workshop. All she had to do was to perform the labor; she received no direct wage for her work, and neither the management nor the investment of the capital of the household was hers.

A Premium on Irresponsibility.

Hardly one woman in a thousand forty years ago had an individual bank account; a woman did not know how to draw a check, or execute a deed or lease—all she had to do was to sign her name when she was told to do so. The planning, the decisive word, was for the man of the house. All of this discouraged self-reliance, and put a premium on irresponsibility. In fact, self-reliance and decision of character were popularly considered masculine traits and unlovely in woman—yet both are absolute essentials in all co-operative work, both in the business and social world.

Every intelligent, thinking being is bound to change his point of view at times—growth itself means change. One has a different outlook in a secluded valley from the panorama that spreads before him when he climbs the mountain heights. But that change is only permissible as far as his own personal interests are concerned; when other interests are involved, change must be a matter of mutual consent. The inviolable sanctity of the written or spoken word is practically the basis of all business to-day; hardly any money is used in the payment of obligations—it is the "I promise to pay," whether on note or check, that is behind all financial transactions.

Rights Involve Duties.

In the new duties that are being laid upon us in the world of business, of social service, of citizenship, we must lay aside all remnants of the old irresponsibility like an outworn garment—we must feel that when we have entered into an agreement with others to do a thing, we must do it, if the heavens fall. To think of changing our minds, when other interests besides our own are involved, is not only childish irresponsibility but is unworthy and unethical. The "more life and fuller" that we are craving and receiving carries with it not only its rewards and blessings but its obligations and penalties; as we receive the one, let us not shrink from the other.

Portugal Gives Women Votes

From the new Portuguese Republic comes the report that under the electoral law, just passed, a limited number of women in Portugal have been given the parliamentary franchise. The same law puts a property qualification on the men, but so slight a one that manhood suffrage is practically established. However, the number of women enfranchised by this law will be comparatively small because of the age limit and educational test.

About a year ago Dr. Carolina Angelo, a woman who since died, entered her name on the registry as a citizen. Her application for the vote formed a test case. The judge ruled that she was entitled to citizenship. By this legal decision women in Portugal were declared eligible for the franchise on the same grounds as men. By the new law, the senate has now partially confirmed this legal decision by granting the vote to women over 25 years of age, who have passed a certain educational test.

Woman's Doings

—Mrs. Bramwell Booth has for many years been the chief assistant of her husband, the new head of the Salvation Army throughout the world. When he was chief of staff she shared his responsibilities. She may be said to occupy a position in the army in England similar to that occupied by Miss Eva Booth in America.

—Miss Mabel T. Boardman of the central committee of the American Red Cross has started an endless chain letter device to bring money pouring into the Taft campaign fund from the Republican women of the country.

—Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, wife of a millionaire, who has turned from poodles to politics, conducted a women's Wilson meeting in Union Square, New York, last week and fought 200 struggling men and boys who tried to reach her to get a Wilson button. A thief stole her handbag. The handbag contained a pocketbook, a pair of silk gloves, a powder puff, a handkerchief, a bunch of keys and other accessories.

—Miss Ruth Eliot, granddaughter of Dr. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, has announced that her wedding to her grandfather's secretary will not take place until she has mastered the art of housekeeping. Accordingly she is taking lessons in homemaking at her summer dwelling. The romance dates from her trip round the world with Dr. and Mrs. Eliot.

Iowa convention is held next week at Oskaloosa. Each service during the six days is provided with an "official time-keeper." This is an innovation, but every convention goer will commend it as a good thing and greatly needed.

The officers and directors of the Brotherhood of Disciples have announced a special train to the Louisville convention, running from Kansas City through St. Louis. It will connect with parties coming from states west of Missouri. Secretary E. E. Elliott has charge of the train.

New Ministerial Relief Leader

W. R. Warren has quietly retired from the editorship and management of the Christian Evangelist to become Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief. His leadership of this neglected cause will dignify it in the eyes of the brotherhod and result in the gathering of a fund adequate to support our aged and needy ministers. This cause has always appealed strongly to Mr. Warren who has rendered it on many occasions effective though unofficial service.

Believe in Village Church

F. Lewis Starbuck, pastor of the village church at Shirley, Ill., reports the completion of a new parsonage costing $3,500. and reminds us that it is only two years since his congregation dedicated a new house of worship costing $6,000. The population of Shirley is less than 100 and supports a Methodist church also. Mr. Starbuck has been pushing his work with the same energy and methods that build up churches in larger places and believes that there is a great place for the rural church.

"College of Missions"

The "College of Missions" it is now to be called, instead of Missionary Training School. The new name comports with the purpose of the institution established at Indianapolis as a memorial to Sarah Davis Deterding. The missionary women who projected the school intended it to be of graduate grade, presupposing a college course on the part of the matriculates. It was felt that the original name identified it with the more elementary and superficial, though admirable, institutions which offer short-cut training for missionary and general religious work. Principal Charles T. Paul has outlined his course from the point of view of advanced discipline. Students from our own and other religious bodies have taken advantage of this unique institution. No other body has yet established a production with like purpose. For the new year new courses have been added, embracing the rural and slum problems of American missions.

From Pulpit to Chair

After four years of successful ministry in charge of the great church at Bloomington, Ind., J. C. Todd has resigned to accept the appointment to the Bible chair at the State University in Bloomington. This chair was established mainly through the efforts of Mr. Todd and he has fostered it in many ways. The recent resignation of Prof. Walter M. Rounds who was its first occupant put up to the pastor of the Bloomington church the alternatives of continuing as pastor or accepting the Chair. He chose the latter, reluctantly giving up the leadership of the church whose people were equally reluctant to have him do so. During his pastorate the congregation has more than doubled its local budget, multiplied its missionary offerings by four and 400 members have been added to the roster. In addition to the establishment of the Bible Chair a chapel has been opened in a fruitful field on the margin of the city. Mr. Todd is well equipped for his new work. His pastoral ministry could best be described as a teaching ministry. He received his training in Missouri Valley College, Union Seminary and Columbia University. Four pastorates mark his career—two in Missouri, one in New York City and the one which he is now relinquishing. At the last state convention Mr. Todd was elected president of the Indiana convention for next year. He has the confidence of his brethren. His new duties, as Bible Chair professor and University pastor begin this month.

Church Extension Offering

The annual offering began last Lord's day, we hope in a most liberal way. The offering should be promptly sent to G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. Zwinglius Moore writes from Deming, New Mexico, "We are now in our basement and the promised loan of $3.000 from the Chuch Extension Fund, with which to complete our church building, is one bright star in our horizon." They will take the annual offering.

Peter Ainslie of Baltimore sends these good words: "No call among us is more sacred than that of church extension. Not only has the record been remarkable but the blessing of the service has been beyond calculations"

W. N. Briney of Louisville, Ky., writes: "It should be an easy task for this great brotherhood to raise the $35,000 in September to reach the million. I sincerely trust that Louisville will have the honor of entertaining the convention at which it is announced that this worthy aim has been reached."

R. H. Polly of Allerton, Iowa, is enthusiastic about getting the million this year. He is reasonable when he says: "Church extension is a great work It deserves the loyal support of all the churches. I promise to do my best to increase the offering this year. That million dollar mark must be reached."

There are a thousand good wishes and promises from our pastors like the above. We cannot ask for space to publish them. These few show the mind of our pastors over the country. John H. Booth, the associate secretary, is visiting all the southern California churches in the interest of the annual offering He will be back to speak at the Kansas convention. The corresponding secretary is visiting conventions and churches near home. Let all pull together for the desired goal. Many individual gifts should be sent at once. Let September be sacredly set apart in all the churches for this task of securing the million.

G. W. MUCKLEY,
JOHN H. BOOTH,
Secretaries.

Foreign Mission Notes

R. Ray Eldred, Longa, Africa, reports a severe accident by having his right eye somewhat painfully injured. But Dr Jaggard did good service and he is on the way to recovery.

Frank Coop, of Southport, England, a regular and liberal supporter of the work of the Foreign Society, sends a special gift of $500.

The churches show a good gain in their offerings for foreign missions during the month of August. Their personal offerings

Under date of July 20 Leslie Wolfe reports great interest in the evangelistic meetings at Singalong, Manila. P. I. Eleven were baptized within a few days. The Woman's Society in the American congregation, Manila, supports an evangelist at this point.

Mr. Wolfe reports that we have fifteen brethren on Corrigidor Island. Most of these brethren are in the military department of the government. He reports a recent baptism. The brethren there have agreed to give Apolonio Estrella $10 per month for his support in order that he may evangelize at Cabcaban and at other points in Bataan Province. Corrigidor Island has been called "the Gibralter of the East."

The churches show a good gain in their offerings for Foreign Missions during the month of August. The personal offerings are also much larger than one year ago. The Sunday-schools show a small loss for August.

The churches in the Philippine Islands all report a gain in their gifts during the past year. This is a wholesome indication.

We are indebted to a consecrated Christian woman who sent the Foreign Society $1,050 as a direct gift last week. The Lord reward her and her thoughtfulness and deep interest in the work.

The Foreign Society is closing the greatest year in its history. The reports from all the fields are most cheering. More missionaries are needed. If we do our duty to the work already begun we wil lprovide them. Let it be remembered that the books of the Foreign Society close September 30. The indications now are that the year's report will show a dommendable gain in the total receipts, but much will depend upon the activitiy and liberality of the friends during the month of Septembetr. The gain already is more than $,000 to date.

Illinois

F. M. Stambaugh of Cowden, it is learned, has been called to a church in Ohio, and the call accepted.

Dana Church, where W. O. Lappin is minister, will have the assistance of C. E. Elmore of Ohio in a meeting.

At Hardinsville Church, an all-day service in the interest of old people and former members was held. This church is ministered to by J. I. O'Neal.

Gurnee, Ill., church held a "home coming day" recently under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society which proved a popular success and netted the society $175.

I. W. Lowman, who has been supplying the pulpit at Granite City for several weeks, has been called to the pastorate permanently. His ministry there begins at once.

Watseka Church has extended a call to Norman K. Robertson, pastor of Stanford Church, to succeed Elmore Sinclair. It is not learned whether the call has been accepted.

The annual convention of Disciple churches of Pike county was held at Nebo the 29th and 30th of August. W. H. Cannon, pastor of Pittsfield Church, is president of the organization.

S. S. Jones whose notable pastorate in Danville was concluded this summer has been holding a successful evangelistic meeting at Old Union, near Danville, with thirty-two confessions.

H. H. Peters, of Eureka, dedicated the new house of worship at Darrow, August 25. Leslie Crown, a Eureka College student, has been pastor there for three years and has accomplished a remarkable work. The new house cost $4,500.

Elmore Sinclair, recently pastor of Watseka Church, was united in marriage with Miss Esther Georgia Gunn at Poplar Hill, Ontario. Mr. Sinclair was for five years with the Watseka Church, but has recently become pastor of a church in Kansas City.

Edgar D. Jones, of Bloomington, is back from his vacation in Kentucky, where he spent two months. Immediately upon arriving home he filled an engagement at Mechanicsburg Chautauqua, having been secured to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of J. H. Gilliland, who was to have been one of the Chautauqua speakers. Mr. Jones' pulpit in Bloomington was supplied very acceptably by Fred S. Nichols during his absence.

Eugene T. McFarland, for three years pastor of the Memorial Church, Rock Island, conducted his last service there the 11th of August. Large congregations were present at the concluding services. During the pastorate there were 253 additions, and beside this a new mission school was started in another section of the city. Mr. McFarland was to begin a meeting immediately at Corder, Missouri. His permanent residence will be at St. Louis, where he resided before going to Rock Island.

During the vacation, in September, of Dr. E. S. Ames from Hyde Park Church, Chicago, the pulpit will be filled by five members of his church, on successive Sundays. The speakers and subjects are as follows: Mr. Clarence E. Rainwater, director of Hamilton Park, "The Significance of Playgrounds;" Professor Charles M. Sharpe, of the Disciples Divinity House, "Constructive Theology Among the Disciples"; Professor Howard Woodhead, of the University of Chicago, "Worship and Neighbor Love"; Mrs. Ella Seass Stewart, "The Meaning of the Woman Movement"; Mr. Clifford G. Roe, general counsel for the American Vigilance Association, "The Unsocial Evil."

Secretary's Letter.

The Illinois State Convention is in session this week at Centralia.

Important to Preachers—The list of preachers that will be published in the Illinois year book will be completed very soon after the convention. The new men in the state who have not yet filled out and returned the "Application for Enrollment" should do so at once. If you have no blank on which to make application, write us and it will be forwarded to you at once. There is no enrollment fee, and never has been. This plan of enrollment was adopted by the state convention in 1903. The enrollment is also necessary in order to have your name appear in the list of Illinois preachers in the national year book.

When this is read it will not be too late to send us the dollar from your church for convention expenses, and it will be needed. Kindly see that this is done.

All recent changes of addresses should be sent us at once to insure their correctness in the year book. Our preachers are kindly requested to keep our office posted all the year round. We need to know every change promptly.

J. Fred Jones,
W. D. Deweese,
Secretaries.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

A Unique Mission Study Tour

Reported in a Series of

Fascinating and Authoritative Articles

in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Soon to Begin Continuing Nearly a Year

No feature of American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by PROFESSOR H. L. WILLETT from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett is now forming the personnel of the class which he is to take through Japan, China, Korea, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. The party will sail September 29, and will spend eight months, not in casual sight-seeing but in earnest study of the social and moral conditions of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission both in purpose and plan is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature.

Facts about the missionaries.
Facts about the Oriental religions.
Facts about Oriental social conditions.
Facts about Oriental types of civilization.
Facts bearing upon the practice of Christian Union on the mission field.
Facts as to the Church in the mission field.

Facts, gathered at first hand, by a competent and discriminating observer, and reported in fearless and graphic fashion, are what the Christian people of the Occident want.

This they will receive through Dr. Willett's articles.

Present readers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will do their friends an important favor by calling their attention to Dr. Willett's Travel Story and advising them to subscribe

The Freemasonry of Souls

WHY HAVE CHURCHES? RELIGION IS a spiritual matter. It is devoutness toward God, mercy toward men and purity in the heart. What has going to church to do with this? Why not worship God under the open sky, in field or park, or in the home? Why not be content to keep the mind free of evil and filled with clean thoughts and extend the open hand of kindness to our brothers?

It is said that Jesus organized no church. He had, indeed, very little to do with the church, except to expose its leaders. He wore no vestments. No acolytes carried his train, or marched before him with the insignia of a new or an old religion. A preacher, yet he held no official position. A boat was his pulpit or a smooth rock on the hillside. He never asked men to go to church or to join one. He appointed no "days" or services. He wrote no Bible. He preached the kingdom of God, an ideal republic of souls, not an organized institution with officials arranged in a hierarchy. And, as if to make yet more individual his message, he declared that this kingdom was within men, not outward and observable and ostentatious.

Why have churches, then? It would almost seem as if our conventional church arrangements are a sheer appendage to the Christianity of Christ.

But let us look a bit further into what Christ did.

He did get men together. Their getting together was informal; his own person was the unifying factor of their company. He called men to follow him and they found themselves forthwith in a social company of others who had likewise been called. He knew that the social give and take among his disciples was necessary in order for his message to be understood and to become effective in their lives. He kept these men near to him and near to one another. They shared life in common. There was no ritual, no plan for an institution. There was just this gathering of men together to talk over what their life might mean at bottom, to learn from the one who was able to teach, to question one another on the meanings of his instruction, and to plan together how they could teach others and help others. This Jesus did do: he brought men together, to think and pray and plan and work together.

This is not the least of the secrets of Christianity's power: it presupposes that the best goods of life are procured through a social exchange, and it provides a way for this exchange to take place. The religion of Jesus is not just an individual experience but a social experience—socially conditioned and socially expressed. Being a Christian is not to go away from the world to think and think, but to think in company, to talk one's thoughts, to listen to others talk their thoughts and to plan to make the big, common, social thought a practical reality in the world.

And the church is just this spiritual intercourse taking place. It is the organized freemasonry of the Spirit.

Within this freemasonry men are held not by an aesthetic bond—a similarity in tastes or an equality in culture, nor by an aristocratic bond—an equality in caste or wealth. "The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all." Nor is it an intellectual bond—an agreement in a creedal statement of truth. The church is the one level upon which man meets man, where the accidents and devices that separate them, soul from soul, in business, in society, in education—where all these barriers are broken down and the really human in us holds communion with the really human in others. We are all one in Christ Jesus, bound and held together by the one Spirit.

It is this freemasonry of souls that gives meaning and argument to everything we do in the church. What we call the ordinances possess value so far as they promote this free fellowship. The great argument for baptism is not that Christ commanded it, but that man needs it. The young church would have been compelled to invent it had not Christ instructed his disciples to administer it. Baptism is the initiation of a soul into this fraternity. It marks with a beautiful symbol his self-commitment to the common life. It is his oath of allegiance to the republic of the Spirit.

The Lord's Supper, too, possesses value because it aids in maintaining the communal spirit. The common loaf, the common cup, the common Christ of whom we all partake—it is more than a feast of memory, it is a fraternal sacrament, it is the holy altar of the freemasonry of souls.

In this view how meaningful are our gatherings together in the house of God! What lack in the lives of those who refuse to assemble with their brothers on the level of the Spirit! The singing together, the praying together, the thinking together, the resolving together, the working together—this together-ness of our religion is the essence of it. Who can sing the "Hallelujah Chorus" alone? If closet prayer has certain values that public prayer does not possess, let us also freely grant that there is a unique thrill and uplift, an enlargement and enriching of soul, in social prayer.

And the prayer meeting, treated with neglect if not contempt by ninety-five per cent of the Christian people, what an ideally beautiful occasion it might be! It is the soul's big chance. Here even the distinction between the teacher and those taught is broken down and all are teachers and all are taught. It is here that the freemasonry of souls is meant to find its most characteristic expression. The weak show their weakness and the strong lend their strength. Self-importance and self-seeking have no place. We are gathered together on this level because we are souls with aspirations aching in us, with great deep needs for companionship and faith. In our individual lives some of us blunder along in the valley. Some climb bravely up the steep ascent. Rare souls achieve the heights and stand above us with the golden crown of the morning upon their heads.

But the church is the level, invisible upland upon which stumblers and climbers and those who dwell in the heights stand together, each giving to all, each taking from all the courage and power of victory.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Passing of General Booth

William Booth, founder of the Salvation Army, is dead. He arose from the ranks of English yeomanry and before his death was entertained by royalty in several countries and was given an honorary degree by Oxford University. He has been declared by an enthusiastic Frenchman to be more than an Englishman. "You belong to humanity," was the tribute given.

General Booth came up among the Methodists. Religion among them seemed as much stereotyped as did religion among the Episcopalians to John Wesley. There was to be found piety, but piety of a sort ill adapted to meet the present needs of the world. General Booth struck out boldly to create the organization that would reach the unchurched masses of the city.

It is to the honor of General Booth that he was the first great religious leader to combine successfully the passion of religious devotion with the sympathy and service of the modern social program. It is to the latter that the world pays tribute. The theology of the Salvation Army has never commanded serious attention. Aesthetics of worship have been ruthlessly sacrificed and the big drum of the army has added a doubtful interest to the movement. It is when we tell the story of the social service that we find the element which has won the heart of the world.

The Salvation Army maintains over a hundred rescue homes. It has over two hundred shelter and food depots, and five hundred other social institutions of various types. It supplies in the course of a year ten million free meals and five million free beds. In every large city the ministry of this organization has commanded respectful attention. We are most familiar with the girl who stands on the street corner at Christmas with her dinner pot, soliciting funds for Christmas dinner. This, however, is one of the smallest of their tasks. At every army post are to be found men who have been truly saved. What terror of the law failed to do, what conventional religion passed by, has been gloriously brought to pass by the Christlike love and sympathy of the Salvation Army.

The Recruiting of the City

On Labor Day, the writer joined in a picnic of former residents of a central Illinois village, Sibley. This picnic was made possible by the fact that there are now in Chicago more citizens of the Sibley of twenty years ago than are left behind in the village. The village is the same size or a little smaller. Chicago has meanwhile trebled her population. In the city are to be found many similar picnic organizations. They indicate the direction of our movements of population. This tendency to recruit great cities is growing rather than lessening. We have yet to see the ultimate city. That it will be far larger than the greatest city of the present day, we may be free to prophecy.

The Whiskey Fallacies

The stock arguments of the crowd in favor of licensed saloons are shown by events to be very weak. We have been told with great assurance that a no-license law could not be enforced. Virginia Brooks, the young woman reformer of West Hammond, Illinois, is just now busy showing that where there is even one citizen with backbone, the law can be enforced and that in the midst of the very worst immigrant conditions. The saloonists have persistently stated that there was more liquor sold in dry communities than in wet.

Yet they have not explained why the breweries spend so much money to carry a local option election. If it were more profitable for a town to go dry, we might expect to see the saloon-keepers joining the ranks of the no-license contingent. The saloonist has further argued that whiskey will always be drunk. This was once the view of the country, even of the preachers. The great army of the total abstainers is the answer to this slur on human nature. The alcohol curse in America is no more respectable than the opium curse in China. They are solving the opium problem in China by arranging that there shall be no more opium sold.

The cure for the saloon in this country is to be found in like radical methods of extermination. It is too late in the history of civilization to call the protecting of weak citizens paternalism. It is fraternalism.

What the Archbold Accusation Means

The investigation of the charges brought by Archbold against Roosevelt have abundantly proven one thing already, a very different thing than was intended. Whether Roosevelt allowed himself to be elected by Standard Oil money or not—and we believe he did not—the confession of Archbold stands as evidence that big business has guilty complicity in the work of electing public officials. One journal speaks of the invisible government of special privilege. That there was such an odious control of public affairs in America by great corporations was once the discredited theory of muck-raking magazines. Now it is the shameless statement of one of the greatest American leaders in high finance.

It is high time that America awoke to the seriousness of the situation. The eyes of the world are upon us. A great cloud of witnesses waits to see whether there is left in America that quality of manhood that will save the democratic institutions inherited from the fathers for the further blessing of mankind.

Parade for Righteousness

On the 28th of September will take place the next great civic parade in the streets of Chicago in behalf of righteousness and purity. These parades have been great successes in recent years and at one, not long since, General Grant led the march. Floats appear in the line of march setting forth dramatically the great reforms. Banners bring an indictment against evil conditions in the city that make everybody think.

It is hoped this year there will be 20,000 in battle array. It is proposed that there shall be five hundred preachers in the march in solid phalanx. The demonstration aroused the frantic opposition of the saloons in former years, which is one of the best of evidences that they feel that the plan is effective. It pays to advertise and the work of temperance, purity and righteousness has never had a more effective presentation in the city than that given by the annual parade.

The Trouble in Central America

Countries of Central and South America seem to be realizing at last what the United States has done for them through the operation of the Monroe Doctrine. Two Central American states are peevish because other states were getting more benefit than they, and they seized property belonging to an American syndicate. United States marines were hastily landed to protect American rights. Honduras and Nicaragua, through exploitation and graft, are in debt over their heads. They saw the benefits Santo Domingo is receiving by having the United States collect her revenue. The United States turns half the receipts over to the creditors, and gives the other half to the Domingan Government. This half is more than the native government was able, because of graft, to collect altogether. Nicaragua and Honduras wished to make a similar arrangement, but congress refused its sanction and the commerce and industry of the two states became utterly demoralized. The United States may have to take charge of revenue collections until the states can again stand on their feet.

Humanity's Needs

Many the creeds since time began
  Both here and o'er the seas:
But faith in God and love for man—
  Humanity needs but these.

Warnings advise us to cease, from above,
  The constant strife for pelf—
And this will die, when we but love
  Our neighbor as ourself.

Many the armies that maim and kill
  Brothers of equal birth;
All this must change, perhaps not 'till
  God's will is done on earth.

Many the laws in various realms,
  E'en be they yet so small;
The great law that them all o'erwhelms,
  Is the brotherly love of all.

The Great Refuge

One might think that we are no longer in need of a refuge of any sort. We have banished many enemies. The wild beast is no longer a terror since we have discovered so many instruments of destruction. Diseases that once were the scourge of the earth have been brought under the dominion of science. While wars have not altogether ceased, the man of the present knows nothing of the fear to which his tribal ancestor was exposed. We have conquered so many enemies, why should we not hope to put them all under our feet?

It is the shallow mind that discovers no need of a great refuge for the modern man. Do all we can, death is still unconquered. We may prolong life; we may free it from inconvenience and fear; we may enrich it beyond the dreams of the men of former days, and yet we cannot feel certain it will abide for another day, and we know that for the majority the limit of three score years and ten will never be reached. But life seems to have more meaning than we get out of it in this world. And when we search for its larger meaning, we long for some one to assure us of the fuller life.

Personal failures drive us to our refuge. Only the moral idiot can be without consciousness of sin. The confession of the sincere and intelligent must often be, if not in words yet in sentiment: "We have erred, and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep. We have followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts. We have offended against thy holy laws. We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; and we have done those things which we ought not to have done; and there is no health in us." As the years pass by and the effects of our thoughtlessness and our selfishness begin to appear; we cry out to God to forgive the sins of our youth; that is, if we have knowledge of God. We need him that we may have assurance of the forgiveness of sins.

An ideal of some sort is necessary for participation in social activity, and this ideal must be a perfect social order. That it may be realized men need to coöperate. The man of vision must announce what he has seen and the teacher, statesman, preacher, and business man must give concrete expression to the vision in institutions and laws. But how discouraging is the task of helping the world toward the kingdom of righteousness. In the way stand all the institutions built by selfishness. Those who ought to be actively interested in all true progress are often content to criticize the earnest souls whose faith puts them to work. Then it is that a refuge is needed.

The earth is full of refuges. There are men and women to whom we go when our own strength gives way. These great-hearted ones soften the pain that seems unbearable; they comfort the broken-hearted and send them out to work with courage, and they lead the sinful to a realization of the true cause of their miseries and to renunciation of evil ways. There are homes which are places of peace. Within them the tongue of slander and the shamelessness of greed lose their power to annoy and torture. The church, when it is a church of God, is a refuge to all that know shame and defeat. If in the day of darkness and doubt, of loss and sorrow, men and women do not turn to the church for help, the church is not to them the institution it ought to be, whether the fault belongs to it or to them.

Inasmuch as the great refuge is God, and inasmuch as the persons and institutions that shelter us in times of sore distress are those that give us the sense of God's presence and goodness, the way to God should be made easy to all. We serve men by removing the obstructions that have been placed in their way by the folly and deliberate wickedness of men. If the ways that other generation found useful are no longer serviceable, it is false reverence to insist that this generation shall go to God as their fathers went. It is God we seek, and the way is important because it leads us to God. The worship of the church has for its object the realization of God. Hence we can never be careless in preparing for worship and remain faithful disciples of Jesus. The preacher who neglects his preparation for the worship of his congregation is defrauding them. And the members of the congregation who come to the service without honestly endeavoring to contribute something to the value of the worship have need of repentance. A congregation that worships God in spirit and in truth is enabling the world to find the refuge it needs. To think lightly of worship is to think lightly of one of the great opportunities of service. [Midweek service, Sept. 18, Ps. 91.]

Making a Fizzle of Life

"I've made a fizzle of my life," said a man of middle age who was dying. He had not been dissipated or lazy; he had a good mind and was an alumnus of one of our largest universities. Possibly he judged himself too harshly, but those who knew him best felt that his self-estimate was largely justified.

"Fizzle" may not be an elegant word but it is expressive, and conveys a definite idea. It represents the net results of more lives than a few. Applied to a life, it means that the individual has failed to be and to do what might reasonably be expected from him, and what he is conscious of having power to accomplish. He may be rich or poor, educated or ignorant, largely or meagerly endowed mentally, if he realizes upon his assets to the best possible advantage he cannot charge himself or be charged by others with making a failure of life.

The man whose words are quoted at the beginning of this article never held himself steadily and persistently to a given task. He would work hard for a time at an undertaking, and then, all at once, he had abandoned it for something else. He never found an occupation to which he gave himself with whole-hearted devotion through a period of years. It is quite possible that some men may jump from one thing to another and still accumulate a fortune. But, as a rule, that man makes most of his life who dedicates himself to some specific task, and holds his purpose fast through all adversities and all discouragements.

In this thing of alluring visions which call us from our work lies the explanation of a large measure of human inefficiency. The man of whom we have written was always having dreams of a great fortune to be made in a short time in doing something else than that in which he was then engaged. He chased rainbows all his life, and never came upon the pot of gold. The other man's job is likely to look more attractive than our own. We know of preachers who never seem to appreciate or enjoy their own field, but are constantly telling of the "soft snap" which some brother pastor has. To learn early in life that every job has its difficulties, and that the other man has his discouragements and obstacles even if we cannot see them, is a great achievement.

The man who confessed to having made a fizzle of life would have done better had he shown a more kindly and winsome spirit in his relations with his fellowmen. He was attractive in personal appearance and impressed strangers favorably; but he had few friends. To an undue estimate of his own importance he added an autocratic manner that was offensive and repellant. His temper was his master and led him to speak words and do deeds that alienated those who had been his friends. If he secured a position, it was only a short time until he began to complain that he was not appreciated and not receiving what his services were worth. No wonder that when the poor man came, at the close of his life, to look back on the years he felt that he had miserably failed.

The world is on the lookout for men who can do its tasks, and, when it discovers such a man he is likely to be appreciated. Few things are more sickening than the whine not infrequently heard, "I am not appreciated." It is likely that the complaining one does not find his fellows placing the same estimate upon his power and services that he has formed of them. There is where the trouble lies. But the measurement of us made by others is likely to be more trustworthy than our own, for they have clearer vision and judgment less biased.

One of the most valuable personal assets is a good disposition. The man who faces the world with a sunny face, the outward expression of the sunshine that fills his heart, will never lack friends. Kindliness, self-restraint under provocation, determination to allow nothing to make us harsh or vindictive, bulk large as useful capital.

No man need make a fizzle of life. He may not get rich or become famous, but neither of these achievements is essential to success. Whoever uses his powers to the development of his own soul and the betterment of life about him has realized the purpose for which he has been given life, and so has really lived. When will all men realize that we have been given trustworthy directions for such living and the assurance of constant and efficient help to realize it? Across the years comes the tender but compelling voice of the world's great Teacher, telling how we are to save life by losing it. Before us rises the vision of One who walked in rough ways to a tragic death, and whose example has been pulling the world upward for more than nineteen centuries. The sure recipe for successful living is with Him, as is the power to accomplish it.

British Episcopal Leaders Enlisted

A deputation from the Protestant Episcopal Commission on a world conference on the faith and order of the Church of Christ, which has recently visited England, Ireland and Scotland in the interest of the proposed conference, was received most hospitably and with great encouragement. The deputation consisted of the Bishop of Chicago, the Bishop of southern Ohio, the Bishop of Vermant, and Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., of New York. Their conferences and interviews were confined to representatives of the Anglican Communion in the British Isles, as the sole object of this preliminary visit was to enlist the co-operation and participation of the churches of England and Ireland, and the Episcopal church in Scotland in the proposed conference.

The deputation conferred at Lambeth Palace with the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and with the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Bishop of Gloucester, Bishop Tucker, Canon of Durham, the Dean of Westminster (Bishop Ryle), the Dean of St. Paul's (Dr. Inge), the Dean of Wells (Dr. Armitage Robinson), the Dean of Ely (Dr. Kirkpatrick), and Rev. Canon Walsham How. The Bishop of Oxford and other invited guests were unable to be present, but the Bishop of Oxford afterwards expressed his approval. It was decided that the Archbishops of Canterbury and York should appoint a large committee, composed of bishops, priests and laymen, to represent the movement in England. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Chicago were asked to draw up a memorandum expressing the conclusions at which the conference had arrived. Its main features are:

(1) That the Archbishops of Canterbury and York appoint a committee in the church of England to "organize, support and help in England," and "to stimulate general interest and regular and wide-spread prayer" in the matter of the conference.

(2) That invitations to the various religious bodies in England, to take part in the bringing about and conducting the conference be extended to them by their co-religionists in America.

(3) That the committee of the church of England should "markedly hold itself in readiness to confer with such bodies or committees as may be appointed in the non-Episcopal churches; or if so be, with those who might represent the Roman or Eastern churches."

(4) The Archbishop of Canterbury expressed the opinion, which was concurred in by the representatives of the church of England, that it would facilitate the matter of co-operation of the church of England, if the American origin of the Conference should be born in mind, and the possibility or probability that the Conference, when held, should be on American soil. This, however, was not, in any way, suggested by any of the American deputation.

The deputation had a conference in Edinburgh with the Primus of the Episcopal church in Scotland, and other Bishops, and with a group of Bishops in Ireland. It is confidently expected that a commission will be appointed to represent the Episcopal church in Scotland.

The members of the American deputation feel that their visit to the British Isles was productive of much good. It well illustrates the value of conference. A few days spent under the same roof and around the same table, asking and answering questions were worth more than months of correspondence.

A Very Important Distinction

The Christian Evangelist of last week takes exception to two statements which it quotes from The Christian Century. One of these is our statement that "faith in the Lord and repentance from sin are the sole qualifications of admittance into the Church of Christ, and that baptism is the act of uniting with the Church of Christ—not a condition of uniting but the act itself." Our contemporary calls this a distinction without a difference, and asks, "Why should faith and repentance be excluded from the process of uniting with the Church, seeing that they are essential conditions of baptism?"

This sounds strange coming from a newspaper presumably familiar with the characteristic thinking of the Disciples of Christ. Of all religious bodies Disciples have been most given to discriminating three distinct acts within the conversion process: faith and repentance and baptism. The Christian Century did not say that baptism was the "process of uniting with the Church" but the definite act of uniting.

Conversion or salvation may properly be called a process but baptism or uniting with the church is a distinct act within this process and contributing to its completion. The process of conversion begins inwardly, in the individual soul, with faith and repentance. It is completed outwardly by the social act of baptism. Faith and repentance have to do with the inward disposition, with personal character. Baptism has to do with social status.

A Christian in the New Testament sense is not simply a person who possesses a Christian disposition, but one who has accepted the status of a Christian in the eyes of his fellowmen; one, that is to say, who has become a member of the Christian community, which is simply another term for the Church of Christ. There are many men and women in whom the preaching of the gospel has produced the essential Christian disposition of faith and penitence, but who refuse to become members of the Church of Christ, refuse to accept the social status of a Christian, refuse to be baptized.

By this refusal to be baptized, to definitely invest their personalities in the Christian community, the conversion process is not fully completed. It was because our Lord saw plainly that conviction produced by preaching the gospel was not sufficient that he instructed his apostles to make disciples and to baptize them. The distinction made by The Christian Century is our Lord's own distinction and is reënforced by St. Paul when he says that we are "baptized into the one body." Again we repeat that to make baptism a condition of membership in the Church of Christ, instead of the very act of becoming a member, has not a word of scripture to justify it.

The other statement to which exception was taken by our St. Louis contemporary is our assertion that immersion is not baptism. The Christian Evangelist replies: "We do not know any Disciples who ever did believe or teach that 'immersion in water' in itself is baptism. What the Disciples do hold is that 'immersion in water' by a penitent believer in Jesus Christ, in obedience to his command, is Christian baptism."

The Christian Century does not wish to be represented as trifling with this subject or caviling in our discussion of it. Of both trifling and caviling we should surely be guilty if there were no more meaning to our contention than is involved in the distinction here drawn by our contemporary. We therefore take occasion to state as explicitly as possible that in our view the immersion of a penitent believer in water, in obedience to Christ's command, is not Christian baptism. Christian baptism is the induction of such a penitent believer into the Church of Christ, and is administered by the authority of Christ.

Christ did not command penitent believers to be immersed in water. He commanded them to be baptized.

There is no conceivable moral significance which can be attributed to the physical act of immersion, standing by itself, even when performed by a penitent believer and even though performed in obedience to an assumed command of Christ. The physical act of immersion in water has no more meaning when performed by a penitent believer than when performed by an unbeliever.

Marriage is not equivalent to giving and receiving a ring.

Taking oath is not equivalent to raising the right hand.

Inauguration is not equivalent to kissing the Bible.

Voting is not equivalent to marking a paper ballot.

Naturalization is not equivalent to writing one's name on the legal instrument.

Surrender is not equivalent to handing over one's sword.

To pledge one's honor is not equivalent to clasping hands.

Ordination is not equivalent to the laying on of hands.

Neither is baptism equivalent to immersion in water, no matter upon whom performed or in what name.

Our Readers' Opinions

The Sanity of the Prohibition Movement

Editors Christian Century: Prohibitionists are idealists not prudentialists; optimists not opportunists or optionists. They are not idle dreamers but prophetic seers; not sentimentalists but sentiment makers. They are not fool fanatics and fantastic faddists but earnest men of sober, steadfast faith.

Prohibitionists are not visionaries but missionaries. They are sturdy pioneers engaged in clearing forests, not degenerate heirs destroying ancestral vineyards and orchards. They are a Gideon's band. They are scouts spying out ambuscades, not camp-followers looting spoils. The vanguard of the most progressive of today is encamped far behind the rearguard of the prohibition army of yesterday.

The Prohibition party is not a party of one idea. In its platform it has always championed many righteous principles and opposed vicious policies. But it has persistently and consistently maintained that the liquor problem is paramount to all others, not only because the traffic in alcoholic beverages is a breeder of pauperism, insanity and crime, but because it is in itself, like gambling and prostitution, a criminal occupation. Being such, good government demands that it be outlawed, not legalized.

The liquor problem is not only moral and social, it is economic and political. So long as the national government is a partner in the traffic, and so long as there is a "National Liquor Dealers' Association" this problem cannot be dealt with adequately by local methods. Constitutional treatment only can cure such an organic cancerous growth on the body politic. Local palliatives only aggravate it.

We believe that it is best to keep our faith even though we lose the election. Our defeats are Bunker Hills—and Pisgahs. We would rather lose sixteen elections standing for prighteous principles, than gain one by lowering the standard in unholy compromise—confident that when we win one election for principle all compromising policies will be dead and buried beyond hope of resurrection.

For the verity of these affirmations we appeal to our platforms and the record of forty years of history. We are sure that our cause will ultimately prevail because it is right. As heirs of the eternal covenant of faith, we expect the Lord to raise up a Joshua to lead us over Jordan into Canaan in his own good time. Meanwhile, having put on the whole armour of God and having done all, we stand.

Nearly Broke His Record

Editors Christian Century: I am a Republican, have been from the organization of the party. I voted for John C. Tremont, the party's first candidate for President in 1856, and have voted for every Republican candidate all down the line to and including Wm. Howard Taft.

In all these years I never thought of voting for any other than a Republican for President. But I want to tell you right here how nearly I came to changing the order of my voting. During the National Republican Convention at Chicago, when the fight was on between Taft and Roosevelt, and many thought Roosevelt would win, I resolved in my own mind and so declared publicly that if Roosevelt should get the nomination and the Democrats should name Champ Clark for President, I would vote for him. But thanks to Mr. Wm. J. Bryan Brother Clark lost out in the Baltimore convention and I am saved to the "Grand Old Party," the party that abolished slavery, fought secession to its death and restored our union, and by its wise administration of the government has made it the best of all nations of the earth. I am proud of the fact that I served three years, '62 to '65, in company with hundreds of thousands of other Republicans and loyal Democrats in the war to preserve the union, and I hope that when the great game scheduled to come off in November is over, I will have done what I could to put a certain hat out and over the ring—so far that its owner will not be able to flip it back again.

Liquor Question Fundamental

In the Christian Century of August 15, Rev. Mr. Jordan spoke of the rejection by the Progressives of the plank dealing with the liquor question as of no particular consequence. A mere "doctrinaire" or "fad" question in comparison with the issue dealt with in that platform.

I believe in the platform of the Progressives so far as it goes—but I am not one who believes the liquor problem is small, nor do I believe there are very many "Pregressives" who believe it is a small problem.

Mr. Jordan enumerates a list of some of the planks adopted, and through the columns of the The Christian Century I would like to ask him a few questions.

Who is against honest primaries?

Who is responsible for placing judges on the bench of such moral standards that it is thought necessary to put a plank in the platform making the courts responsive to popular control?

Did Mr. Jordan ever try to get a man tried before any of the Chicago courts for violation of the liquor laws? Some of the judges are all right, but many are wrong.

Why cannot even the city's ordinances be enforced?

Why is Chicago over-run with criminals and crime?

Why is the murder rate in Chicago more than twenty-four times greater than in London?

Why is old age insurance necessary?

If government regulation of trusts could reduce the cost of trust produced articles 10%, how much would that reduce the cost of living of the average wage earner in Chicago?

Who is opposed to an industrial commission, and whom do they use to prevent its establishment?

What element chiefly opposes woman suffrage?

What in the main makes child labor laws necessary?

What causes the high cost of living?

What is the value of annual product of the textile industries in this country?

What is the annual product of the steel industry?

What is the liquor bill?

Why has Kansas an assessed valuation of $1,750 per capita when Illinois has $346 and Missouri $300?

If Cook county's real estate, at full valuation, were sold for cash, for how long would it pay Chicago liquor bills at present rate of consumption?

What do the people get in exchange for the vast amount of cash paid for alcoholic beverages?

What percentage of crime is caused by alcohol? of insanity? of poverty? of death?

What is the rate of insanity in Illinois and Wisconsin as compared with Kansas? Why this difference?

Who pays for the mantenance of jails, hospitals, police courts and loss of earning capacity?

Has this anything to do with the high cost of living?

What effect does alcohol have upon health?

If England is model, enjoying advanced social legislation, why has it become necessary for her to lower the standard of admission to her army and navy?

Why did the Supreme Court of Iowa say that "thinking men of this day generally concur in the opinion that the saloon is the chief peril to American institutions?

Are you aware of the tremendous social revolution going on in communities where the saloon has been banished?

Do you expect to bring about a new and better social order in any community before the saloon is destroyed?

You say, "the saloon is a great evil and in the end will be abolished." When? How?

Why not destroy it now?

If the liquor traffic is a great evil why was it not mentioned in the Progressive platform?

How do you reconcile your statements that the liquor problem is a small matter and at the same time "a great evil"?

Is getting rid of a great evil a small matter?

The last session of the legislature lacked only fourteen out of the 153 members of being free from liquor control. In Chicago the 51 liquor candidates elected were chosen at the primaries, by the votes of 67,020 men when 322,169 registered voters did not vote. The Anti-Saloon League made a hard campaign before the last primary and won over the state at large, sixteen more candidates that it had two years ago, winning six more in Cook county. Many church men worked loyally, without them nothing could have been done. But let me ask you frankly, Brother Jordan, how many men will catch an inspiration from your article to make a sacrifice to fight from now till November 5, for a legislature free from liquor control.

"The have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly saying—Peace, peace, when there is no peace."

Safety in Strength

By J. H. Jowett

(Sermon preached in the Spurgeon Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, and reported in the British Congregationalist.)

"Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe."—Psalm cxix. 117.

What do we know about the suppliant? What made him offer that prayer? What was the character of his surroundings, and how would the prayer be answered? How did it affect his character, and how might he change his conditions? We have only a fragment of autobiography, but even that very tiny fragment may be like the smallest pin-hole through which we may see a panorama of moving life and destiny.

It is the cry of a man in peril. It reveals a man driven to the imperative necessity of seeking help in God. I can see through the fragment something of his environment. I can see the threatening circumstances that surround him like a hostile and besieging host. I have studied this little fragment, and I have tried to see one or two things in the Psalmist's circumstances which impelled him to offer the prayer.

The "Double-minded."

First of all, I see round about this old-world suppliant a class of people who are described in the fragment as being "of a double mind." The double-minded, literally, are people with "a mind and a mind." They have no fine singularity. They are favorable to both sides in a contradictory issue. They are two-faced. They are partial to everything. They are wholly devoted to nothing. Their wardrobe is stocked with every kind of livery, and they are always dressed in the fashion of the immediate hour. They can speak every language. You never know where you have them. They are at home in every circle. They are "hail-fellow-well-met" with everybody. I will call them the "chameleon type," taking the color of their immediate environment.

Evil Doers.

There is another class of people that I think we can see in this little fragment of autobiograpy, and these are described in the very simple phrase, "Evil doers." The first company is the company of the adaptables. "Evil doers" suggests a company of the deliberately vicious people who purposely espouse the wrong and make a policy and a success of it. Illicit advantage gains its ends. Unlawful contention wins the prize. The vicious return home every night laden with spoils. They set their snares; they catch their victims. They lay their traps; the victim falls. They weave nets of deceit, and their bags are full. That is the significance of the old record. This little fragment of autobiography describes an evil that apparently pays.

The Peril of Ignoble Compromise.

Here is a man who is surrounded on the one hand by people of a double mind, and on the other hand by people who are triumphantly successful and who have come to their success by evil roads. What are his perils? When you are in the presence of the double-minded you are in the peril of resorting to fatal and ignoble compromise. The influence of the double-minded is always in the direction of congenial agreement, and their motto is agreeableness and not righteousness. The double-minded man always believes in blends. He never believes in contrasts. So he never wears white, and he never wears black; he always wears grey, because it goes well with either.

This old autobiographical fragment is quite up to date. It might have been torn from a page of our own times. For we, too, are afraid of vivid contrasts.

A Medium Tint.

We are inclined to choose a medium tint and a medium tone. We shrink from a too vivid morality that would startle men by its separation from the world. A man is tempted to take his strong conviction and soften it into a mild opinion. He is tempted to take the forked lightning out of his religion and to substitute a kind of harmless sheet lightning. He is tempted to substitute for a virile religion a weak religiosity.

And whenever I meet with double-minded men my peril is to try to keep step with God and Mammon. That is one of the perils of our time, an outstanding peril of the Christian courage and his recititude, but it was only when John Morley published his great biography that we saw the mighty tap-roots, by which his moral and spiritual vigor had been sustained. And throughout Christian church of our day. We are timid lest we scare people by being too violently religious. So there is an absence of the strong note, the absence of Apostolic boldness and decision. And religion is just prone to become a mild agreeableness. There are tens of thousands of professedly Christian people to whom religion is only a sort of pleasant flavoring, a squeeze of lemon in the dish, and not the stuff itself—the meat and the drink and the substance of life. And so it happened that this old-world man, who lived so near to God, when the double-minded came along wearing grey, he lifted up his heart to God and he said, "Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe."

Glittering Worldliness.

And the second peril was the peril of "the garish day." He was surrounded by glittering worldliness, by the dazzling presence of prosperity and success. He felt the power of the glare, and he feared it. I sometimes think that the devotional books of the Bible have more to say about the perils of the glare than they have about the perils of the night. There are so many things that cannot stand the untempered blaze of the noon. I sometimes call them "the ferns of the spirit," and I wish that the New Testament had used the word "ferns," instead of "fruits," to describe them. We wonder why God took us out of the glare, and when all things are reckoned up we may find that the purpose was to give us a better chance of growing the fern.

Ferns Need Shade.

When I had a tiny little greenhouse it was my delight to grow ferns. But I had to grow them in the same house with the flowers. It was a very difficult task, and I frequently had to remove the fern from the upper shelf, and move it away down into the comparative twilight and shade, in the hope that there in the shade I might give my fern a better chance. There are one or two ferns that grow gloriously in the shade, but it is hard work to grow them in the noon. Humility—it is very hard to grow that, if you haven't a care—forbearance, long-suffering, the patience of unanswered prayer.

And the Psalmist looked out on the glare of worldly prosperity, and then he looked inside at his fernery, and he prayed that God would give him strength, lest his ferns should be destroyed. I do not say you cannot grow ferns in the noon. I have seen them growing in New York, of all the places in the world to grow ferns! I have seen them growing in that materialistic country, that gloriously successful country, from the standpoint of money, and commerce, and wealth. I have already made the acquaintance of many a fernery in many a soul where the graces of the Spirit are growing, even in the noontide glare. You can grow these ferns, but you cannot grow them without God. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

The Bewitchment of Wrong Success.

And the other peril is the peril of delusion. When you see a man devise a trick, and by the trick succeed, oh! the magnetism, the mesmerism, the bewitchment of ill-devised and ill-engineered and contrived success. When you see unfairness carrying the palm, when you see unfairness walking away with the prize, when you see iniquity wearing the garland, the evil-doer laden to the point of burdensomeness with his spoils, you are in great danger of being deluded. The Psalmist was in danger of confusing things that differed, and of mistaking one thing for another. That is the devil's way. He makes us confuse ease with peace. He makes us confuse comforts with comfort. And he makes us confuse successful living with a successful life. Like the Psalmist, we, too, are in danger of thinking that plenty brings satisfaction, and that all we have to do is to get a high position, and then we have got deep peace. The devil turns life into a dream, and we see all things upside down. He makes us pursue a shining mirage, and we find it to be burning sand.

Strengthens Within.

What was the content of this man's prayer? "Hold thou me up." That seems to suggest a strong one coming down to a weak one who is just about to totter and fall, to take him by the arm, and to help him along the difficult road. But it is not that. Never think when you speak about God helping us that God, as it were, gives us an arm, and helps us along the troublesome road. Not that. The Lord never gives a strong hand to help a cripple. He never gives a cripple a temporary stimulus, which will soon pass, and then subside, and he will lapse again into his original weakness. When God holds us, it is not the gift of a crutch. It is the gift of strength. See how the same word is used in the original in other places. "The Lord strengthen thee out of Zion." And again, "Strengthen thy heart with a morsel of bread." The Psalmist's prayer really was, "Make Thou me strong, and I shall be safe." "O Lord," he seemed to say, "make me morally and physically robust, and I shall be safe." There is the emphasis. We do not want people going along the pilgrim way on crutches.

Springing Buoyancy.

There is a sort of spring and buoyancy given by the religion of Christ. "By my God I can leap over a wall." There is spring for you. There is buoyancy for you. "Thou hast made my feet like hinds' feet." Have you ever seen a deer skipping up a hillside? God is not going to give us a crutch. "Hold

Mrs. Douglas, who was walking with Mrs. Masters and who had during the trip heard of this one Christian Hopi, went over to the foot of the ladder with her. Paul, who was tremendously interested in all sorts of Indian lore, went into the house to examine some wedding baskets. The two Pittsburg young men suddenly found themselves surrounded with an Indian group selling curios. Walter sauntered over in the direction of Miss Gray to ask her about the kivas. Felix stayed jealously for a while by Helen who was simply carried away with the wonderful sights all about her, but looking over in Mrs. Douglas' direction and seeing her for a moment alone, thought his opportunity to speak to her ought to be seized at once, and went over towards her. And so it happened naturally enough that for a moment Helen and Van Shaw were left together. The crowd of tourists, curious, chattering, laughing, careless, flowed up the trail past them and began scattering over the village seeking curios and poking their heads into the doors of the little houses. The sun flamed out in a clear blue sky, the grey rock turned red under its hot stroke, and Helen, who lay restfully on her litter which had been placed on top of one of the kivas, indulged her romance-loving spirit to the full as she lay there almost forgetful of Van Shaw's presence until she was startled out of her day-dream by his voice as he moved from where he had been standing and came and sat down on the edge of the kiva near her.

CHAPTER XV.

"Miss Douglas, I haven't had half a chance to talk to you and you'll forgive me, won't you, if I take advantage of this moment."

Helen was not in the slightest degree prepared for what Van Shaw was going to say. She was conscious, as every beautiful young woman must be, of her charms and of the effect of them on the young men she met, but she would have been a most remarkably vain and shallow person if she had ever imagined for herself such a scene as the one now being acted on the top of the rock at Oraibi. The wildest stretch of her romantic temperament had never carried her so far, and when she first began to really grasp the sense of what Van Shaw was saying she was frightened and angry. At the same time there was a certain feeling of pride and exultation of which she was vaguely ashamed.

Helen quietly began to say some simple thing in reply to Van Shaw's first remark when he hurriedly went on, interrupting her:

"I won't have much time to speak now, but I'm going to risk everything, and tell you. I just can't keep it to myself. It may sound awfully absurd to you—I suppose it does, but I can't help it. I'm simply dead in love with you and I want you to know that I——"

"What!" said Helen sharply. She was so disturbed, so confused in her mind that Van Shaw's words seemed unreal, as unreal as the kiva on which she was sitting or the changing groups of vivid color moving about on the tops of the houses.

"I can't help it," Van Shaw began again hurriedly, "You do not know how fascinating you are. It has just swept me off my feet."

This time Helen understood what Van Shaw was saying and her face was flooded with a swift wave of color. And she said coldly:

"You have no right to talk to me like that. I will not listen." She turned her head and saw her mother just coming out of Talavenka's house, standing at the foot of the ladder as if preparing to go up with Mrs. Masters to the house roof.

"Mother!" she called, in a dim way thinking of nothing except her desire somehow to escape a very embarrassing scene with Van Shaw. But there was so much noise made by the clattering groups of tourists and the sudden arrival of newcomers that that moment Helen saw Bauer speaking to her and the next moment he and her mother had walked slowly off together up the tortuous village street and were lost to sight in the crowd.

Van Shaw sat down on the kiva, and smiled a little. But his face was pale, and evidently for one of the rare occasions in his life he was truly and desperately in earnest.

"You can't blame me, can you?"

"It's—it's simply impossible. It's out of the question. I have not known you two days."

"It doesn't take lightning two days to hit," said Van Shaw doggedly.

"I won't listen. I forbid your talking to me," said Helen haughtily.

"All right. But you can't forbid my thinking of you."

"But I can and I will refuse to be in your company!" said Helen. She was angry now at something undefined in Van Shaw's manner. "If you do not leave me at once, I will try to leave you." She actually made a movement to rise and put her foot on the ground at the edge of the kiva. Van Shaw instantly got up and said quickly, "Of course I'll go. But I can't change my feelings and never shall. Promise me one thing. Don't believe all the stories you hear about me."

He had turned and walked up the street and Helen sank back with a strange feeling of relief mingled with shame and again that other feeling— what was it, pride? The sense of power over men? The feeling that her beauty was a gift or something else? She was frightened at it all put together and felt irritated to be left alone by the rest of the party as she looked around at the medley of old and new jumbled together in that Hopi village. And then the next reaction left her nervous and somewhat hysterical as she tried to imagine such a thing in a book. She actually laughed and the next moment Miss Gray and Walter appeared at the edge of the kiva. Miss Gray came running up to her.

"It's a shame to leave you here alone. How did that happen?"

"Oh, I don't know. I haven't been alone long. How strange everything is."

"Yes. And it gets stranger the more you see of it. Talavenka and her mother have asked us to eat with them. They will have something ready in about an hour. You had better go in and rest there a while. It's too hot out here. Where are your jinrikisha men?"

"Van Shaw just went up the street," said Walter looking closely at Helen.

"We don't need him," said Miss Gray. "Mr. Douglas, will you get Mr. Coleman and Mr. Calder? There they are, over there. I'll help, and we'll take Helen over to Talavenka's."

Walter went over to call the Pittsburg young men and Miss Gray and Helen were together a moment. Helen suddenly asked:

"Do you know Mr. Van Shaw, Lucy? Didn't I hear you say to mother yesterday that he was related distantly to your mother?"

"Yes," said Miss Gray slowly. "He is. What do you want to know?"

"Anything you can tell me."

Miss Gray looked troubled.

"Are you willing to tell me why you want to know?"

Helen hesitated. Walter and the young men were approaching.

"Give me your full confidence," Miss Gray smiled at Helen. "And I will know better what to tell."

"I will when there is time for it," Helen said and that was all she could say, before she was carried into Talavenka's house.

Once inside the little square room with its corn grinding boxes taking up one whole side of it there was so much of interest that Helen let everything else wait as she watched the preparations for the meal.

It would be several hours before the snake dance and in that time there was not likelihood that Van Shaw would try to speak to her again. She was not afraid of that, but she felt uneasy at the thought of some future scene, just what she was not clear about, but it vexed and allured her until finally the surroundings compelled all her attention and drove everything else out of her imagination.

Her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Masters and Miss Gray were invited with her to the midday meal in the house. The rest of the Tolchaco party ate out of doors on the platform by the door. There was boiled mutton, red, white and blue wafer bread made of corn meal that made one think he was eating wallpaper, Elijah Clifford said, melons, green peas taken from a can that had a Ft. Wayne, Ind., label on it, and to Mr. and Mrs. Douglas's astonishment some delicious peaches brought by Talavenka's brother all the way from their little garden down by the Oraibi Wash. In reply to questions from Mr. Masters, who used Talavenka as interpreter, Schewingoiasche said, as if it were an ordinary every day occurrence, that her oldest boy, nineteen years old, had run twenty-five miles that forenoon to get the peaches from the orchard for their anticipated guests.

About an hour before sunset they all went out to the village plaza to witness the great event of the year in Oraibi. And as long as they live they will need no photographs or pictures to make the weird scene vivid to them.

Picture a grey mass of rock rising up abruptly above the desert, bare of tree or shrub; scattered over its irregular top, blocks of two and three-story stone and dried brick houses, for the most part square in outward shape, with steps on the outside built into the wall, or heavy ladders with long projecting ends resting upon platforms built in front of small square topped doorways, the roofs flat and covered with dried grasses. No stairways within these houses permitting passage from lower to upper rooms, and all built after century old architectural plans, by the hands of women. Between the blocks of irregular houses picture rectangular slabs of stone rising two feet above the ground, containing an opening in the middle out of which project high in the air the two ends of a hard-wood ladder, the rungs of which have been worn almost through by the passage of naked feet that have pressed up and down on these bits of wood for scores of years. It is not easy to imagine the real fact that down in those upstairs cellars the men of Oraibi lead their club life, weaving down there in the dim light that filters past the ladder, the rugs and belts and other material mysteriously used for religious ceremonial. And down in the snake priests' kiva, just over yonder, the venemous reptiles have been kept for weeks past in the sacrificial clay jars, out of which they have crawled during the rites of their purification and hung in twisted, hissing knots out of the crevices between the sides of the kiva walls, from which places the brown hands of old Thisdoa, Talavenka's father, have only this morning taken them to put in the cottonwood booth out on the village plaza, where they are now awaiting their part in the coming ceremony. For old Thisdoa is the head priest and knows more of the mysteries of the snake nature than any being in Oraibi.

The sun is just on the edge of the desert. All traces of the morning storm are vanished. Out on the tops of the houses all about the open plaza, groups of men and women begin to appear, the unmarried girls distinguished from the married by the graceful whorls of black hair standing out in marked contrast with the two rolls that hang down past the ears of the matrons. Cowboys, Navajo horsemen, traders, all the non-acting part of Oraibi's population, tourists, photographers, visitors, crowd up in a rainbow colored fringe about the sandy depression which now contains only one conspicuous object, the cottonwood booth or kisi, the size of a boy's wigwam, having a canvas flap on the side opening close by the broad board over which the feet of the priests will thump as they file past. A moving picture machine is installed on the top of a near-by house. The Boston, New York, Pittsburg, Cleveland and Chicago tourists and newspaper men are grouped about in what they believe are advantageous positions. The costumes vary from smart tailor made dresses worn by the tourist girls from Cincinnati to a Hopi child's dress made of a piece of a gunny sack bearing the name of a Minnesota flouring mill. Over all the jumble of old and new, modern and ancient, the setting sun floods the medley of color and language and dress and Christian and pagan. And in the stillness that waits the coming of the twenty-four priests out of the kivas, the town crier walks out on the corner of a house top and cries aloud an announcement of a service to be held that night in the little mission chapel out there on the edge of the rock.

"What's that?" asked one of the tourists near Clifford.

"That's the town crier of Oraibi," said Clifford. "There are no newspapers up here and the official village news purveyor is telling the crowd to come over to the Gospel meeting to-night. He says Mr. Masters is going to preach in three languages. Better come and hear him in one of 'em."

The tourist stares at Clifford. "Well of all the places on earth for preaching, this beats me. Do you mean to say a preacher will actually hold a service up here after this snake dance and expect to get an audience?"

"Will he?" says Clifford cheerfully. "You had better come early or you won't get a seat. And as for preaching you'll hear a better sermon than you ever heard in Cincinnati, Ohio."

"I guess that may be so," says the tourist. "For I haven't been to church since I don't know when."

"You need preaching then, like the rest of these heathen," said Clifford so simply that the Cincinnati man takes no offence but promises to go over to the service if he isn't too tired.

The rim of the sun is an hour above the horizon and the crowd has ceased its chatter. It is very quiet on the grey rock of Oraibi, although a thousand people are looking intently at the openings of the two kivas. Suddenly from the one nearest the Tolchaco party up the ladder the chief of the Antelope priests appears. He holds the rattle box in his hands and is followed by the eleven priests, the last one a lad twelve years old. The line twists through the fringe of visitors, as oblivious of any onlookers as if they were going through this ceremony five hundred years ago when not a white face was dreamed of and when the Hopi was doing exactly what old Thisdoa and his grandson are doing to-day.

Then from out the other kiva the stately snake priests emerge, a group of twelve old men each bearing the rattle which contains the grains of corn. The incessant pattering of the rattles is the only sound heard in the plaza until the soft moccasined feet reach the board over the hole in front of the kisi. The thump, thump, thump of the feet pound over the board to call the attention of the underworld gods to the needs of their children up here. The sandy plaza is traversed and the two lines of priests circle about, finally stopping in front of the kisi, facing one another; then rises the "wo, wo, wo, wo," the guttural chant. The Hopis have been for many years a peaceful people, but this monotonous chant, rising occasionally into a swelling crescendo howl sends delightful cold shivers down the backs of the visitors, and even Elijah Clifford says he wouldn't want to meet that howl unexpectedly around the corner. Then the priests file past the kisi one by one, stoop by the opening and receive from the old warrior priest sitting within, a snake. Each one raises his snake to his mouth and holds it there between his teeth as he walks about the plaza accompanied by his hugger or companion. Suddenly the snakes are released and thrown down upon the sand. They make swift and desperate efforts to escape but are caught up again with such rapidity of movement that the closest attention paid by the tourists can not discover how it is done. Round and round the procession of twenty-four moves. Out from the houses near the snake kiva a group of girls and women suddenly run. They stop at the edge of the plaza near the Tolcharo party and scatter the sacred corn meal on the ground. Navajo horsemen dismount and pick up pinches of this sacred meal and put in their pouches for good luck. The twenty-four priests with their snakes twisting in their sinewy brown hands turn together and with a common movement all dart up to the place where the meal lies. They circle about the spot. Paul raises Helen up a little higher so that she can throw a horrified gaze into that astonishing scene. For a moment the only thing she and the rest can see is a squirming, hissing heap of snakes, apparently tangled together in an angry mass. And then the twenty-four priests shoulder one another as they stoop and with both hands grab up as many snakes as they can hold in their fingers, and suddenly separating, turn and face towards the edge of the rock, running with all their might, thrusting the snakes into the faces of any unlucky tourist or visitor who may be in the way.

There is a rush for the edge of the rock. Those who line up there see the lean figures of the priests leaping down the wild trail. Their forms can hardly be distinguished as they reach the desert and are dimly seen to be kneeling in prayer over the snakes as they let them go, down to the great plumed snake to beseech him to send rain, rain, rain, on the corn and melons of his children up here.

The rest of the ceremony is purification. The priests come panting and sweating up the rock. On the edge of the snake priests' kiva the women bring out huge jars of mysterious brown liquid.

The panting figures kneel there in the now desert twilight and drink great draughts of this liquor. Kneeling about over the rock they disgorge from their mouths what they have been drinking. The merciful darkness is closing in swiftly over this disgusting scene, participated in, however, in all reverence by the priests and gazed upon in astonishing seriousness by the spectators, for is it not all a part of the painful crucifying of the flesh that these poor creatures have been subjecting themselves to for centuries in their blind but constant desire to find God, the God of the rain, the rain, the rain.

Gradually the priests disappear down into the kiva where a feast has been prepared for them by the women. The great festival, which will not occur again at Oraibi for two years, is over.

Paul sees Masters standing by him. In the dim light he realizes with a start as he looks up, that the tears are rolling down over Masters' face.

"Oh, the people! How long will they seek after God in these ways! Oh, for the power to open their eyes to see him as He is!"

Through the growing darkness groups of tourists and visitors pass, choking the narrow paths between the houses, crowding into the trail down to the wagons at the foot of the rock. Among the confusion of chattering voices and exclamations one shrill voice of a girl penetrates through to the hearing of Masters and Paul.

"Wasn't it the greatest thing you ever saw? and oh, how picturesque! Those people, those girls on the houses! What a pity it would be to spoil it by trying to civilize these nature children!"

Masters looked at Paul grimly.

"Yes, it would be a great pity, wouldn't it? I wish that girl could stay here one winter and enjoy the picturesqueness of a Hopi Indian girl's life. I wonder if she has any little thought of the real life of these 'nature children?' Of its misery, its impurity, its dreadful sin and superstition and darkness; its infant morality; its pain and disease due to the absence of any sanitary or medical skill. But most of all its ignorance of Jesus Christ and his love. 'Picturesque!' I grant you it is. But Christianity would not destroy anything worth keeping. For centuries these 'nature children' have walked in darkness. Are they not entitled, like that white girl, to the light of life? And did you see Talavenka when her father reached into the kisi for the snake?"

THE SEPTEMBER FLOWER GARDEN

September is described in one of the current garden magazines as "the month of harvests—the time to sit down and enjoy the results of our spring and summer work."

This poor gardener has not found much time for sitting down and enjoying the results of her labors, so far. What with bugs, and weeds, and watering and staking rampant plants, like dahlias and chrysanthemums, and driving out neighbors' chickens, and preparing for the winter garden, the time of rest is not yet. And pulling dead flowers, and lurking seed pods, is no small item in the day's work—for fall flowers seem possessed with a perfect frenzy for going to seed, and unless that is checked their bloom time comes to an abrupt termination.

Praise of Frost.

In moments of exasperation and exhaustion she has even echoed Charles Dudley Warner's praise of frost. That moralizing gardener was so much impressed with the inequality of man's fight with nature—how man becomes weary and dispirited with the struggle, but nature is ever fresh as at the beginning, and eager for the fray, that he says, "I, for my part, begin to appreciate the value of snow and frost; for they give the gardener a little peace and enable him for a season to contemplate his incessant foe subdued. I do not wonder that the tropical people, where nature never goes to sleep, give it up and sit in lazy acquiescence."

But this spirit of friendship for frost only comes at rare and overworked moments. If it killed neighbors' chickens as well as weeds and insect pests, one might view its advent with complacency; but as its power is unhappily limited, the havoc that it works among flowers and green things growing overbalances the small relief it brings.

Preparation for Frost.

For frost is not a far off phantom, to be contemplated from a safe distance—it is all but on us now. Any time from the middle to the close of September this arch enemy of vegetation may put in an appearance. Perhaps, it is this coming shadow of doom and death that makes the flowers look so beautiful now; for most flower lovers find in them a mellow richness and clearness of tint, a perfection of form, that midsummer, with all its riotous growth, never attains. She looks on him with the same wistful yearning and pathos, that a mother does on her soldier boy on the eve of battle. However, this first skirmish with the advance guard of winter is not necessarily fatal; the frost may be light and do little damage—but then, it may be heavy and lay low many a tender plant. So it behooves the September gardener to be vigilant and resourceful. Let her study diligently the weather indications: if she has lost faith in the weather bureau by a long series of false prophecies, she might find some old-time darkey who knows all about the moon, and the winds, and the clouds, and learn from him exactly when frost will be here; then she can throw some light covering, like an old shirt, or some tobacco cloth, or some newspapers (if she can prevent their blowing away) over the sensitive plants. If they survive the first frost, they often gladden us with their blossoms all the calm, restful, October days.

Changes in the Floral Pageant.

The floral pageant has undergone some changes since we wrote of the August Flower Garden. Those lovely friends, the lily and the gladiola, have vanished in a mist of sweet and tender memories, but new faces have taken their places. The clematis paniculata, fragrant as beautiful, is falling like a bridal veil over many a porch and trellis; the hardy blue ageratum is crowding in spots that the perennial phlox is reluctantly leaving. The dahlias are in their prime now, the scarlet salvia is growing richer and more luxuriant every day, and the asters are even more beautiful than they were last month; for the large, long-stemmed, white ones are now opening their breasts to the sun; and not only to the sun, alas! but to the aster bug as well!

Many of the roses are beginning their fall season of bloom. Altogether, in the September flower garden every plant, whether hardy shrub or exotic geranium or begonia, nourished by the timely showers and sunshine of this most bountiful season, seems to be doing its best to give all the joy and brightness it can to life. And even yet there are newcomers to swell the pageant. The cosmos, looking like some lost child of spring in its delicate pink beauty, is yet to come. And the chrysanthemum, peerless queen of the autumn garden, is the goal to which many hearts are now turning.

The Sweetest Flower in the Garden.

Preparation for the Winter Garden.

If you wish blooming bulbs in your house this winter, the latter part of September is none too soon to start them. A dozen each of Roman and Dutch hyacinths, of narcissus and freesias will gladden your household during the chill gloom of winter. The Roman hyacinths will bloom by Christmas (earlier if you force them), the narcissus will follow fast after, then the freesias, and the latter part of the winter will be brightened by the Dutch hyacinths. Their culture is of the simplest; but one thing is imperative—get the best bulbs that money can buy; when you take the trouble to raise house plants, it is poor economy to buy cheap bulbs. If you can get them from home florists, do so by all means; but if they are late in getting their fall supplies, order from some reliable firm at a distance. Do not let this month pass without making a start toward your winter garden.

Then some pleasant morning go into your garden with your bulbs, have your flower pots and plenty of rich dirt at hand; if you wish to use small three or four inch pots, one hyacinth or narcissus bulb to the pot is sufficient—if larger ones are used, two or three bulbs to the pot; freesias, being very small, can be planted five or six, or even more, to the pot. If one desires to economize space, the hyacinth bulbs can be started in grape baskets, and then transplanted to flower pots, after the bloom bud is well formed; they can be moved without any injury to them.

After the bulbs are all potted, dig a trench in the garden, set the pots in it, cover them thoroughly with dirt, water once or twice till the earth is well settled, then leave them in peace for at least six weeks. This planting in the ground is better than putting in the cellar, for cellars are often troubled with rats, which will have no compunction about eating your bulbs. They (the bulbs, not the rats), need not be taken up and brought into the house until November, when you can use your own discretion about watering and bringing to the light.

Woman's Doings

—Miss Mary Legdard, who goes from Los Angeles to Foochow, China, to take the principalship of the Foochow Kindergarten gave up a $2000 position for a $600 one. She says she goes to China for life.

—Mme. Helen Dutrieu, one of the foremost women aviators of France, has cabled her application to the officials of the Aero Club of Illinois for permission to take part in the Gordon Bennett cup races. This is the world's most dangerous aviation event. Picked air pilots of the world compete annually and usually new records are made. The appeal of Mme. Dutrieu marks the first attempt of a woman aviator to be entered in a great speed event.

—Miss Helen Keller, who is deaf and dumb and blind, and nevertheless a college graduate, has been appointed a member of the Board of Public Welfare in Schenectady, New York.

—Several hundred women are doing the work of men along with men in four Cleveland foundries, is the unrepudiated charge of Harry D. Thomas, secretary of the Cleveland Federation of Labor. E. E. Adams, superintendent of the Cleveland Hardware Company, admitted that women are employed at the plant at heavy work. "We have employed these women for ten years, and they are contented with their jobs," said Adams. "They do not work near the fires."

—Gertrude Atherton of California, who writes novels that people seem to like to read, has taken the stump for Governor Wilson. She says, "It will never be possible to call Woodrow Wilson 'Woody,' as Roosevelt is called 'Teddy.'"

—The Japanese have recently established a Young Woman's Christian Association at San Francisco, this being the first one of its kind in the United States. It starts with 150 members, the Japanese Christian League furnishing the money.

A Convention in Shirtsleeves

With the thermometer registering close to 100 in the shade every day, the Illinois convention, meeting last week at Centralia, found that the only way it could make conditions tolerable at all was to take off its coat. Early in the convention Miss Lillie Faris, in beginning an address, requested all the men to remove their coats. Most of those who had not already removed theirs did so and any sense of impropriety on the part of those who were already coatless was banished by her merciful invitation.

In spite of the almost blighting heat the convention was one of the best in the history of the Illinois Missionary Society. Several innovations are worthy of mention. The business was transacted at a single session instead of being scattered in fragments through a number of sessions. The "devotional exercise" was shifted from its customary position at the opening of the sessions where it usually serves hardly more than a means of gathering the people together, to a place in the middle of the morning and afternoon sessions. It was called a service of Meditation and Prayer. Those appointed to lead came, as a rule, evidently prepared to make the service one of dignity and uplift.

Woman's Sessions.

There were over 400 delegates registered. The attendance of Centralia people at the sessions was not noticeably large. The writer arrived at Centralia just as the Woman's Missionary section of the convention was drawing to a close. On all lips there were enthusiastic words for the woman's program. Especially were the people responsive to the messages of Mrs. Florence Miller Black and Mrs. Catherine F. Lindsay. The latter spoke on the Missionary Social Union, the interdenominational society for whose origin she was herself responsible more than twenty years ago in Springfield and which is now spreading to many towns and cities over the land. A prominent minister, new to the state, who heard these addresses was so impressed that he proposed in a conversation that the wisest course for the Disciples to pursue would be to turn over to the Woman's Missionary Society the task of Christian unity. They are actually making progress toward unity.

The address of the president of the convention, Professor Silas Jones of Eureka College came on Thursday evening. It was a rapid survey of the various departments of our modern life to discover whether if He should come now the Son of Man would find faith on the earth. It was a message of optimism, of courage and of warning.

It will not be possible to report the convention in detail. A series of addresses on Wednesday morning by Austin Hunter of Chicago on the "Vision and the Task," Walter S. Rounds of Arcola on "Signs of Promise in Twentieth Century Christianity," and E. W. Allen of Decatur on "The Challenge of the Church to Men of Our Times," could hardly be surpassed on any program. Each speaker dealt in big substantial facts and interpreted them with insight and vigor.

Educational Section.

That afternoon what was in many respects the best address of the convention was delivered by Clyde Darsie, of Jacksonville, on "Holding the Big Boy." The Sunday-school section was in session. Mr. Darsie showed rare knowledge of boy nature, a knowledge that was systematized by the study of psychology, and he spoke his unconventional thoughts with a preciseness and courage that brought conviction to every hearer. The boy held a large place in this session. Mr. Alexander of Men and Religion fame spoke twice on work among boys. His messages fitted up close to Mr. Darsie's address. Miss Lillie Faris of Cincinnati sounded a firm note for the graded Sunday-school and Charles W. Ross of Litchfield spoke earnestly on "Equipment for Christian Service." A higher order of discussion characterized this session than has been customary in the past.

President C. E. Underwood spoke for Eureka College on Wednesday evening. He laid bare the financial facts with reference to the school, discussed the necessity of standardization of the college courses and pleaded for the state to more adequately support this institution. The small college, under church auspices, said the president, is a vital factor both in making the church and Christian society.

The addresses by I. J. Spencer of Lexington Ky., on Church Administration and Church Efficiency were said to be helpful, although we were detained from one and compelled to leave before the other, the last on the program, was delivered. Secretary I. N. McCash represented American Missions, Secretary E. E. Elliott, the Brotherhood; Fred Kline, of Illiopolis, the Benevolent Society. A capital address was that by Louis O. Lehman of Gibson City on "Christian Statesmanship." Tender words were spoken "in memoriam" by J. H. Smart of Decatur. Prominent among the ministers thus memorialized were J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington and O. W. Lawrence of Decatur. A state convention without these two figures present seemed strange indeed.

Informal Discussions.

In the recesses between sessions, as is always true at such gatherings, the delegates talked heart to heart about the things that agitate us. In these conversations at the dining table, in shady spots, on neighbor's lawns adjoining the church, on the hotel veranda where the coolness of the night lured the delegates to postpone sleep until the small hours, such subjects as politics, delegate conventions and the practice of Christian union furnished grist for much talk. Several straw votes were taken, the largest of which showed Roosevelt 26, Wilson 23, Chafin 13, and Taft 2. Among Illinois ministers there is a considerable socialistic tendency, though no sentiment for Debs and his party. There was a marked recurrence of the social note in the public addresses. The socialistic note came out only in the informal conversations.

Illinois preachers and church leaders are a broad-minded group of men and women They waste no time in the small contentions of legalistic correctness, but go straight after the urgent duties of the Kingdom of God.

The reports of Secretary J. Fred Jones and the other state officers showed a good year in receipts and results. Of course, Mr. Jones, the dean of the secretaries of all the states, was reelected.

L. H. Stine, the pastor, has extended a hearty welcome to all Disciples to attend the services.

Of the twelve degrees of Doctor of Philosophy conferred by the University of Chicago last week two were received by well-known Disciple educators, J. B. Eskridge, for some years professor in Texas Christian University and now president of Texas Normal College, and Charles M. Sharpe, lately Dean of the Bible College of Missouri and now professor in the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago.

Mr. Hoh Chwen Gwan, a splendid young Christian man twenty-three years of age, is now in the Y. M. C. A. special training in Chicago. He is a devoted member of the Christian church. He was baptized by F. E. Meigs at Nankin. For eight years he was in the Christian College at Nankin, now University of Nankin. After finishing his present course he expects to take medical training. Mr. Hoh stands high as a student and as a consecrated Christian man.

Kirksville, Mo., church, W. D. Endres, pastor, reports an encouraging year. Sunday-school; Junior, Intermediate and Senior Christian Endeavor Societies; the Helping Hand Society; Ladies' Organized Work; and the Woman's Missionary Auxiliary were all active and fruitful. Funds amounting to $5,084.25 were raised for all purposes, of which $430 was for missions and benevolences. A new pipe organ, the best in that section of Missouri, was installed and considerable repairs made on the church edifice. Ninety-eight persons were added to the membership, a net gain of sixty-five.

The following characteristic item appeared in the parish bulletin of Vincennes, Ind., church, of which E. F. Daugherty is pastor: "Folklore tells of a minister whose people surprised him with a donation party, and whose wife the same week presented him a new daughter. Two wagering wags in his flock made a private bet over which the parson would be thankful for first, in his Sunday morning prayer, donations or babe. The wager was declared off when the first prayer phrase of the parson rolled forth, 'Oh, Lord, we thank Thee for the timely succor coming to our home since last we met.' So feels this congregation's shepherd over the new daughter at the manse."

On his return from his vacation H. J. Loken was greeted by about 250 of his Berkeley, Calif., parishioners at a social reception in the church. The occasion was called a home coming, and speeches of welcome and enthusiasm were made by a number of the members, including Professor H. H. Guy of the Pacific Union Theological Seminary, and by Mr. Loken. Plans for enlargement were discussed with joyfulness and optimism. R. A. Berry, chairman of the official board, dwelt with emphasis upon the duty of the church to be the radiating center of moral energy and sympathy for the community. The outlook is bright for a great year's work. That Berkeley church has kept its unity in the face of strong effort from the outside to divide it proves its Christian mettle and promises greater successes for the future. There have been fifteen accessions since the pastor's return from vacation.

Institutional Church

A modern gymnasium, including shower baths and bowling alleys, will be a conspicuous part of the new church, Flatbush, L. I. The structure itself will cost $22,000 and will be so equipped as to afford the pastor, R. M. Gordon, opportunity to demonstrate the moral value of a pet theory, which he describes as "muscular Christianity." It is expected that the bowling alleys will draw many men who spend their time in less desirable surroundings. Work on the new edifice will commence shortly.

A Clever and Effective Turn

J. F. Canby, pastor at Urichsville, O., makes a clever and unanswerable turn to the proposal to build a non-sectarian hospital in his city. He believes that such a hospital is needed and pledges himself to work ardently for it. "But," he pertinently asks, "how is it that we discover the need of a non-sectarian treatment of the body but still cling to and defend a sectarian treatment of the soul? If a non-sectarian hospital is a good thing, and it is, would not a non-sectarian church be a good thing also? And if we were to preach the simple gospel of the New Testament, and abandon all other teaching and names not contained therein, would there be any sectarianism? If it is important for us all to unite and work together for the healing of the body, how much more for the healing of the soul?"

Steps Toward Union in a Texas Town.

In the town of Anson, Tex., practical steps have been taken under the leadership of J. E. Chase to effect a working union of northern and southern Presbyterian and Disciple forces. Mr. Chase had been invited by the struggling band of Disciples to hold a meeting. He preached much on Christian unity, declaring that faith in Christ is the sole New Testament test of fellowship. The Presbyterians voluntarily requested him to submit a plan of union, if he had one. He did so. It was adopted unanimously by the Disciples and is under advisement by the Presbyterians with favorable prospects for its adoption by them. Mr. Chase's plan follows closely the outline subscribed to by the Disciple and Congregational Commissions on Christian Unity. It proposes to retain intact the denominational organizations, but to create a union congregation of which they shall be the constituent parts. Into this union church converts will be received by public profession of faith in Christ. If the convert so elects, he may unite with any one of the constituent organizations and be received in accordance with the customary procedure of that organization. A wisely worded provision is that relating to the choice of a minister. The united congregation "shall make diligent search for a minister who will respect his position and not abuse the same, who will without partiality faithfully minister to the united congregation. The sole object of his preaching shall be the salvation of the unsaved and the cultivation and development of the spiritual life of the members. Everything tending to sectarian dogma shall be withheld." The leaven is working. There will be many more such instances. Plans may differ, but the common purpose is too strong and, at last, too intelligent to be hindered by any mere technical difficulties that stand in the way.

Shall We Make Good?

Our 8,000 Sunday-schools were asked to give, during the year 1911-1912, for American Home Missions, $35,000. On September 1 there were 2,154 schools that had sent $29-064.33. During September we are earnestly striving to secure the remaining $5,935.47 to make good our record when the books close September 30. Let every school respond promptly. Many have sent no offering at all. Some have sent a part of their offering for the year. Let all respond that we may reach the desired goal before we gather in the general convention at Louisville, October 15-22.

Send all offerings marked plainly from the Sunday-school to the American Christian Missionary Society, 108 Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Getting the Million

The newspapers cannot possibly give space for all the good news about getting the million for church extension. Two recent gifts of five hundred dollars and two thousand dollars have put us within $32,000 of the million mark. Our brethren of means should be sending large personal gifts in September, and those of moderate means should give according to ability that all may share in the final victory.

The first reports from the churches show a decided increase. The first three to report are Hammond, Gary, and Indiana Harbor, Indiana. Hammond will send $75. They raise this amount and at the same time will pay a note due the Board of Church Extension on October 1, of $2,000 with $200 of interest. Gary sends $40 and Indiana Harbor $20. All of these double their apportionments and Gary quadrupled theirs. All three of these churches were aided by church extension loans and are working diligently to return them.

E. F Daugherty, pastor at Vincennes, Indiana, writes: "In my county of Knox we devote a whole month to the benevolences jointly supported. That means our extension offering will be forwarded to get into the great final push. There are thirteen or fourteen churches in the county." Now, if we had such complete work as that going on in every county we would have a unification most devoutly to be wished for, and our missionary work would be reduced to the minimum expense while we would get the maximum results.

W. S. Priest of Wichita, Kansas, writes that they expect to send $500 from the Wichita churches.

The church at Hutchinson, Kansas, has sent $500. Several Name Fund churches report their full amount raised. Tuscon, Arizona, just having completed a new building, instead of writing that "we cannot take the offering" writes, "I am sure we will not fail to take the offering and we will raise our apportionment. You know our new building has drained us, but I have never yet failed to take the offering for church extension." If Tuscon can send its apportionment under such circumstances surely no church in the brotherhood need fail in helping to complete the million for Church Extension in September.

J. W. Yoho of the Madison Avenue Church, Huntington, West Va., says: "I am proposing to send an offering to Church Extension from our little congregation. We want to be in on so good a thing as reaching a million for Church Extension." This church is also struggling to build.

It is hoped that all the congregations that are helping by their offerings will get them to Kansas City by September 30. Remit to G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

From Indiana's Secretary

The one thing of chief concern now is the offering for Home Missions from the churches that have not yet contributed this year. The year closes September 30. Many of our best churches have delayed the offering until September. We trust that it will not now be negected. We ought to have offerings from one hundred churches this month. Some of our preachers are still indifferent toward this work. Two brethren in the office the other day said their preacher preaches missions but never takes the offering. Brethren, give the people an opportunity to give. Make it easy for them to give. Set the example by giving in the public service as one of them. Preach it, teach it and practice it in their presence and they will surprise you by their ready response. Take the offering at the first opportunity and send it promptly to the A. C. M. S., 108 Carew Building, Cincinnati.

Benevolent Association News

The demand made upon the association by the churches for the care of their aged, indigent members increases. Every day brings its urgent appeals. Someone write, "We have an aged sister here, a life-long member of the church, left alone in the world without means for her support. The church is unable to provide for her. Can she be admitted to one of our homes for the aged?" Another writes, "One of our dear old brethren will be compelled to go to the poorhouse if we can not place him in one of the homes sustained by our brethren." Still another writes, "I have been caring for an aged, invalid sister in the church for a number of years. I have grown old. Circumstances have changed with me. I can no longer carry the burden. This sister has been a faithful member of the church. We would like to put her into one of the homes of the association." These are just a few samples of the many letters that are received almost every day. These do not come as a result of solicitation on the part of the association. Experience has taught us that to advertise an open door means to welcome no end of abuses and to burden the church with the care of unworthy and undeserving people. Since the churches are sustaining the homes of the association, the persons received are received upon the recommendation of the churches. The association is not making a business of caring for people. It is the agent of the churches in the care of their deserving poor.

Women with children make daily application to our homes for the care of children for shelter and support. And the proper handling of these appeals requires the wisdom of the serpent and the kindness and harmlessness of the dove. Experience has taught us that for purely selfish, unholy reasons women often seek asylum for themselves and homes for their children in the homes sustained by the church. Disagreement between husband and wife; desire to be free from family obligation of home keeping; or the privilege of residence in a large city; or to save the family treasury temporarily for some selfish end; and a thousand and one other considerations of like character propmt women to make application to have their children boarded at less than the actual cost in our homes. Hence at a time like this when the association is being besieged with applications it takes the rarest wisdom to save the churches from abuse and to prevent the encouragement of wrong-doing, and at the same time extend a helping hand to every deserving woman and child.

There are about 525 persons, 75 aged and 540 children, in the eleven homes of the association that must be supported. These are all dependents. This number does not include hospital patients, for the vast majority of these should pay their own way. This number includes persons sent to the home by the churches, and therefore deserving, without question, of our support. It takes money to feed and clothe and care for a family of this magnitude. The association needs the money and needs it badly. Brethren, these are your wards. Will you help sustain them? JAS. H. MOHORTER.

thou me up. Make me spiritually strong, robust, buoyant, springy, full of virility, and I shall be safe."

The only safeguard in time of plague is robustness. The epidemic is more dangerous when we are run down. We always invite the enemy, when we are below par. Lapse into weakness is an invitation to the plague. And the principle is equally applicable in the realm of the soul. The only defence against the double-minded, and the evil-minded, is robustness. "Hold Thou me up in health, good Lord, and I shall be safe."

The Source of Gladstone's Power.

The name of Mr. Gladstone will be held in honor through many generations of English history, when all party spirit has sunk and subsided into the ill-memory of forgotten days. Throughout his strenuous life his countrymen knew his nobility and in his private journal, written not for mortal eyes, we find an acknowledgment of his complete dependence upon God amid the trials and troubles of his strenuous life. It is the prayer of the Psalmist, "Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe." Psalmist and statesman alike drank of the river of his pleasure, drank of the fountain of his grace, and both were blessed and helped of God.

These are our resources, yours and mine. If you are on the troubled way, if you are walking over a stony, flinty, difficult road, and you feel yourself beset and in a tight place, then with all my heart and mind and soul I say to you, lift up your tired eyes. If you never prayed before, pray today, and just say, "O Lord God, Hold thou me up;" and I promise you, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, you shall be safe.

Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monumen. to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

No feature of American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by PROFESSOR H. L. WILLETT from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett is now forming the personnel of the class which he is to take through Japan, China, Korea, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. The party will sail September 29, and will spend eight months, not in casual sight-seeing but in earnest study of the social and moral conditions of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission both in purpose and plan is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature.

Facts about the Oriental religions.

Facts about Oriental social conditions.

Facts about Oriental types of civilization.

Facts bearing upon the practice of Christian Union on the mission field.

Facts as to the Church in the mission field.

The New Order of Conventions

IT IS A COMMON SAYING OF OUR people since the Pittsburg Centennial Convention that the Disciples, having come with some degree of honor through the first century of their history, must recognize the responsibilities which their age and experience have brought to them, and attempt to adjust their methods of working to ideals suitable for the accomplishment of the ends before them. Easily the chief of our duties is the interpretation and advocacy of Christian unity. That must not for a moment be neglected or obscured. But in the very accomplishment of this object through the united efforts of a great body of people like the Disciples there are other important elements of organization and procedure that need to be emphasized, and have in fact been too long neglected.

Aside from the great truths of our faith which need insistent proclamation and in which we share responsibility with all the Christian world, there are certain matters of our own growth and administrative work which require urgent and constructive attention. Of these we believe the chief are the imperative necessity for delegate and therefore truly representative conventions; the need of a much larger number of consecrated and trained young men to enter the ministry of the gospel; the need of developing the religious life among our people so that private and family worship may find their rightful place in our regard, even as in the life of the earlier generations of Christians; and not least, the cultivation of the spirit of generous and competent giving, so that the churches may be adequately administered in their efforts to meet the needs of their communities and that the causes of missions and philanthropy may have ample resources.

At this moment it is the first of these factors in the work of the Disciples in the new century that we wish to emphasize. This is no new theme with us. For years The Christian Century has been urging the adoption of the plan of delegate conventions, both for our state organizations and for the national conventions. We shall never be able to accomplish the proper results with our present ineffective, loose and mass-meeting type of gathering. No other religious body of any significance still uses so antiquated a method of gathering. It was probably sufficient in the early days, when our conventions were like town meetings, composed of a fair proportion of the total membership of the churches. Such a body can express itself, since it includes most of those who are concerned in the results of its deliberation. But when a city succeeds to the town or village it can no longer transact business by the town-meeting method. It must appoint representatives who shall interpret its interests and be held responsible for the work accomplished.

It is not otherwise with a religious body of any considerable size. And especially is it true of the Disciples of Christ, who have left so far behind them the period of infancy and early youth that the plays and experiments of childhood seem foolish when measured by the duties and approved methods of maturity.

This, of course, is simply the fault of our wholly anomalous and inconsistent practice of refusing to organize a convention of the Disciples of Christ, upon the plea that we are afraid of a truly representative and competent body lest it should assume ecclesiastical authority and bind upon us burdens that we did not wish to bear. Under this wholly fictitious pretext, in which none of the Disciples take any serious stock, we perpetuate an outgrown and incompetent practice and make futile the effort to secure from the brotherhood its approval or disapproval upon any important question submitted for its consideration. When the matter of Federation was discussed by the churches of America some years ago, and nearly all of them entered with hearty good will into the plan of united action upon matters of a missionary interest and social service, the Disciples who should have been the first to welcome Federation as a step in the direction of closer unity, struggled for five years before they were able to express their convictions and desires upon this great theme. Even then it was only by throwing away entirely the cumbrous machinery of our present conventions, and gathering in a mass-meeting at Norfolk, that the long-delayed decision was reached and the silence of the Disciples on this question so pertinent to all their history and efforts was broken,—a silence that must have seemed pathetic and unpardonable to all Christian people who have had the slightest acquaintance with our claims to be the advocates of Christian unity.

Such is our present situation. We are a people with definite convictions and large purposes, but impotent to express them in any other manner than that mob fashion which is the characteristic of primitive society. The remedy is of course perfectly simple. The churches can choose delegates to our national conventions upon the basis of their membership and by some plan easily agreed upon. The churches would then speak with authority in the conventions. The brotherhood would have a voice that would be heard with deference and courtesy whenever it cared to speak upon the living questions of the time. The reproach of indifference or inadequacy of expression would pass away. The danger of centralization, the nightmare of the ill-informed and the shibboleth of alarmists, would disappear by the simple process of experience. The garments of infancy and childhood would be laid aside and those of maturer years, such as are worthy of a people of the age and strength of the Disciples, would be assumed.

The plan to be presented at the Louisville convention offers a simple and adequate beginning of such a representative gathering. It wisely leaves to the convention itself the solution of the many problems as to the character and power of the organization. It gives the convention a chance to be born, leaving it to live its own life and determine its degree of usefulness in the order of natural growth.

The Louisville convention of 1912 bids fair to become historic by the birth of this new order of things among the Disciples.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Social Progress in England

The government measures for relief of the unfortunate in England are so much more radical than any which are even proposed in this country that there is scarcely any comparison. During the summer, there has gone into operation the National Insurance act which provides insurance in case of illness or unemployment. The workers themselves are taxed to help support the plan, as well as the employers. Those earning less than 62½ cents a day are exempt, but men earning more must pay eight cents a week, and women six cents, to which the employer adds six cents. The sick benefits are $2.50 per week for men and $1.87 for women, with medical and surgical attendance, and sanatorium care in case of tuberculosis.

The unemployment insurance is distinct from the plan set for the above. Employer and employee each contribute five cents a week and to this Parliament adds an amount equal to one-third of the total contributions of the employers and employees. The claimant for unemployment benefit must show that he is willing to work and that he is not able to find employment at the rate at which he is accustomed to work.

These measures are the product of the fertile mind of Lloyd George. There is no more loved and no more abused man in all England today than is he. Especially are the medical men opposed to him because his insurance act seems to strike at their craft. They have adopted labor union methods to oppose insurance measures and the upshot may be an independently organized group of medical advisers for the government.

Here we have an intelligent effort being made to remedy the abuses complained of by the Socialists and recognized by all, but a remedy without the loss of individualism involved in the Socialist program. The measure is too new to be ideal, and will doubtless pass through many changes, but it is a clear and definite recognition of the need of government action for the relief of the unfortunate.

The Civic Parade

On Saturday afternoon, September 28, there will occur another civic parade in Chicago. It is hoped that twenty thousand people will be in line and with banners indicate the reforms in which they are interested.

We are especially gratified at the breadth of program for the parade. While doubtless the saloon will be the object of attack of a majority of the delegations, many other burning social questions will receive their share of attention. There will be protest against the continuance of the unholy alliance between vice and officialdom. There will be demand for the suppression of gambling. The low wages of women in the city will be shown as a social menace. These and many other great human interests will be given due attention.

It is just in this spirit that we would have earnest people always approach the problem of social progress. We cannot afford to be so interested in any one line of reform work that we shall neglect consideration of others.

Tolerance in Political Opinions

Something of the old-time fervor of conviction characterizes the present political campaign. Everywhere we find men who set forth with intensity their belief that their political candidate is the saviour of the country. The Republican is able to believe with genuine intensity that President Taft is the one man to save us from a dip into socialism and anarchy. The Democrat is able to see in his candidate the leader who will deliver us from plutocracy and corporate greed. The Progressive often regards Roosevelt with a feeling of veneration as the one man who has come in the fullness of time to save our country from bossism and bi-partisan combines in politics. The Socialist sees in his leader and platform the one true remedy for an evil economic situation in which there is an unfair division of the economic goods. The Prohibitionist regards the liquor question as the fundamental social evil and believes that in the right solution of this question will be found the approach to human welfare of every sort.

So far as these men have definite and positive convictions, we admire them. We need men with convictions in a time like this. Our only danger is that our very intensity of conviction may lead us to become bigots. The principle of tolerance of our neighbors' opinions is a difficult one to maintain, either in times of political or theological reconstruction. It is easy to persuade ourselves that the man of contrary opinion is either a fool or a knave.

It is because of this narrowness that the little sect of Plymouth Brethren are able to believe that none shall be saved, except in a very few like their own group. It is equally easy for the member of any one of our political parties this year to impeach the honesty of his opponent's opinions. Probably many professional politicians are swayed by interest, but the average American citizen holds his political opinions as honestly as he does any ideas he may have about anything. Faith in this honesty we should never lose.

The Disappearing Home

The number of families in this country owning their own homes in proportion to the whole population is steadily decreasing. In New York there is the smallest percentage of any of the large cities, while in Chicago, which is one of the best cities in this regard, only twenty-five per cent live in their own homes.

Not only do we find a decline in the holding of real estate, but there is a steady decline in the marriage rate of the country. This has been manifest for the past forty years, and is to be found most clearly in the cities.

The perfect home always has children. There is a decline in our birth rate which is especially marked among the American families. The Polish woman still bears fifteen children, but the number of children in the American home is pitiably small in comparison.

The relation of economic forces to these facts is very clear. It requires at least $700 per year to support a family under present conditions. Yet an examination of the wage scale in the steel industry, for instance, shows that the average east of the Mississippi is only $346 per year. The gap between income and the amount necessary to the support of a family is one of the secrets of the break-up of the American family.

Besides these facts, there are also others which have a bearing upon the institution. In the old pioneer days, our grandmother was an important partner to our grandfather. Her work was necessary to him, for she not only kept the house, but she made his clothing and performed other skilled service of which he was ignorant. The development of factory labor has taken industry out of the home and taken away one of the incentives to partnership between a man and a woman.

In addition there are certain spiritual forces that make for instability in our American homes. Differences in religion often prevent marriage, or when they are celebrated, help to break up the home. The marriage of Catholics and Protestants, Christians and Jews, and other similar combinations may make for breadth of mind in some cases, but more often makes for division and trouble.

If the home is to be saved, and with it our civilization, we must remedy the evils which threaten its existence. To this task, the vision and courage of Christian people should be turned.

The World in Chicago

Next May there will be given in Chicago a great missionary exhibition called the World in Chicago. We are already familiar with the World in Boston and the World in Cincinnati. At this coming exhibition, effort will be made to eclipse former efforts as Chicago never wants to do things by halves. Thousands of Christian people are now being enlisted for service, and all the churches are being brought into coöperation.

The feature of the exhibition is to show the native life of the different countries through costumes and exhibits. These exhibits will be explained to visitors by trained workers. There will be an enormous chorus which will furnish music. The exhibits will be in the Coliseum and the meetings will be held at the Auditorium.

The Detroit aldermen seem to have put their reputation up for sale at bargain prices. Some of them asked $100—the most exacting, $300. We are not sure but it was dear at even the lower price.—The Congregationalist.

The Great Reward

"Glory of warrior, glory of orator, glory of song,
Paid with a voice flying by to be lost on an endless sea;
Glory of virtue, to fight, to struggle, to right the wrong—
Nay, but she aim'd not at glory, no lover of glory she:
Give her the glory of going on, and still to be."

Virtue desires the glory of going on because of her worth. Men who possess virtue feel that life is nothing if she is but a temporary phase of existence. To fight, to struggle, and to believe that eternal values are involved, that is life, and life at its best is its own reward. Clamor for power and place is evidence that life is not understood. Once we get into the fight and know how to use the weapons of virtue, we bother ourselves very little about "recognition" by conventions and synods, but we are interested in the advancement of justice.

A successful man said to one who asked how to get on in the world, "Never look at the clock." The fellow whose interest in his work centers in pay day will never be the head of the concern for which he works. To find pleasure only when the day's work is done is not to live at all in any way that becomes a man, and hence is to be without the reward of living. The preacher who pays attention to the honeyed words spoken to him after the Sunday morning sermon and gives them greater weight than he gives to the effect his sermons and private instructions have on the lives of the people has his reward, but it is not the reward of a minister of Jesus. "You love to preach?" asked a great Scotch minister of an American who was then preaching in Scotland. "Yes, I do love to preach," came the reply. "Do you love the people to whom you preach?" was the next question. You fretful preacher or Sunday-school superintendent, do you love the people or the glory that comes from large congregations and large offerings, and do you love the children so much that you look with a certain indifference upon the fact that your school is the largest in the state, or has some other distinction that gives it prominence in the reports sent to the religious papers? When the congregation is small, or the Sunday-school is losing ground, is it your own reputation or the good of the community that causes anxiety?

Is there no reward in loving enemies? We regard this requirement of the Lord as difficult, and no doubt it is for us all. To love the man who persists in lying about us and in inflicting injuries in other ways is a hard thing for every one of us. But the simple fact stands out clear and distinct before all that have eyes to see that the one way to defeat an enemy is to love him. The man who is superior, not in a spirit of disdain, but in a spirit of love and gentleness, to the petty annoyances of evil-minded, envious persons, is the great man of the church and of the state; he is honored by all; his friends trust him with a perfect trust, and his enemies acknowledge his power. He is at peace with himself. His energy is not wasted in foolish wrath and his time and influence are used for the proper business of life. For self-protection we ought to love our enemies. Perfect love casts out fear, fear that some ignorant, morally defective human being can damage us in any way beyond recovery.

By living the life of love we become the sons of God. If we love not, we are not God's spiritual children. If there are any without love, doubtless the joy of knowing God as Father will not appear to them to be very great. Eating and drinking will appeal to them. They prefer the cruder pleasures of the senses; they like to own the material bases of individual and social existence, but they have no feeling for the finer sentiments that arise out of knowledge of God as the loving Father. But is there any soul that is entirely devoid of love? In our ignorance of others we sometimes charge men with sins to which they are strangers. Our imperfect appreciation of Christ and his love accounts for the doubts we entertain respecting our friends and acquaintances more often than the facts justify. We thus miss the full reward of social experience. Men are intended for the family of God. That some do not seem to act like the children of God is no good reason for acting toward them as if they were wholly depraved. We cannot enjoy God and at the same time be hard-hearted toward his children. [Midweek Service, Sept. 25. Luke 6:27-35.] S. J.

Christ's Answer to the Soul's Need

After Jesus had fed the five thousand on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee he used this incident as an illustration with which to enforce a great spiritual truth. In the course of his teaching he declared that except they ate his body and drank his blood they could have no life in themselves. Some of his disciples called this a "hard saying" and followed him no more. Peter, recognizing that he could find the answer to the hunger of his heart nowhere else, having looked about him in vain for that which might satisfy his craving for eternal life, refused to leave his Master. He knew no place where the deepest needs of his soul could be met save in the companionship of Jesus.

Looking out over humanity and noting the eagerness with which we seek for material possessions, marking the headlong rush in search of pleasure, one might be tempted to believe that the world as a whole has no desire for anything better than the evanescent and temporal. This would be to take a superficial view of life and to ignore the findings of our own souls. However swallowed up we may be in the affairs of the present, we have our hours of thoughtfulness and of soul hunger; a deep discontent seizes upon us, not to be satisfied until we have found some one who will meet the longings of our spiritual natures. When we come to know our fellowmen well, to look below the surface of things, we discover that they, as well as ourselves, have their times of unrest and dissatisfaction which can be allayed only by the divine response to their need. This answer Jesus Christ came to earth to bring. In the conscious need and its satisfaction lies the religious life of man.

This makes of religion a much more serious thing than many persons are disposed to consider it. Interpreted in terms of heart hunger and spiritual food, it becomes much more significant than may be expressed in forms and ceremonies and rites. Is it too much to say that there can be no religious life for man without that spiritual desire which Jesus called hungering and thirsting after righteousness? Personally, dare we assume that we are disciples of Jesus and have come into possession of a vital experience of religion so long as we are without this craving? So far as the teaching of Jesus informs us there can be no religious life for man apart from this outreaching of the soul after God and a life which meets his approval.

History makes nothing more clear than the constant presence of spiritual desire in the heart of man through the long centuries past. Crude and even immoral forms of worship, have not sufficed to hide this desire. Underneath the pomp and ceremony of Egyptian or of Roman religious worship one is able to detect that inherent appetite of the human soul for God and goodness which Jesus came to satisfy. We may not ignore the sinfulness of man and the constant tendency of the race to live apart from God, but we are doing man gross injustice if we stop here. In the midst of his wickedness and forgetfulness of God there has persisted always an element in life which makes it impossible that man should be without his aspirations. These aspirations he cannot satisfy by himself. All of the discoveries which make our age noteworthy fail us when we call upon them for the satisfaction of our deepest desires. They may make life more easy and the days more joyous as they pass, but they cannot bring content to the heart.

As the days come and go we are constantly learning new lessons as to the unsatisfactoriness of life lived apart from God. When the days are filled with sunshine and all our plans prosper, when the circle of friends is unbroken and no sorrow touches our lives, we may fancy that we are quite sufficient unto ourselves. Then, all unexpectedly, the storm breaks and we are beaten to the earth. One whom we have loved with exceeding affection passes into the silence, leaving us with broken hearts. We look out upon the things which we have gathered to ourselves and wonder why they have lost their value. For the first time, perhaps, we discover that earthly possessions cannot purchase for us that which is of greatest value; we hunger for some sure word concerning the future; our souls follow far after the one who has gone out from among us; but we cannot penetrate the mists. Is there any one anywhere who can give us assurance that death does not end all? If so, we would find him. In such an hour the Son of God stands before us to declare: "I am the resurrection and the life; because I live ye shall live also."

Thoughtless the world may be; self-centered and indifferent to the great things of life many doubtless are; but the human soul has appetencies that earthly things cannot satisfy and that find their complete gratification only when Jesus Christ becomes Lord and friend. In companionship with him, all the best tendencies of our hearts are strengthened, new and holier purposes are begotten, and the darkness which death brings is made light. If any so-called Christian fails to find in Christ this inspiration to and answer of spiritual needs, he has not yet found the Christ of yesterday, today, and forever.

Ministerial Supply Once More

Within a stone's throw from our door are two competent preachers who seem to be laid on the shelf. They have always been acceptable to the churches until recent months. They are more eager to preach than ever. They will compare with the average preacher anywhere. There is no apparent reason why they should be forced into an uncongenial inactivity. If statistics could be gathered showing the number of unemployed ministers, the conclusion would be inevitable that the supply is adequate, and that our attention should be directed to the problem of devising some system which would awaken the conscience of the churches to the duty of keeping a pastor in the pulpit all the time. The churchless preacher is a minor problem as compared with the problem of the preacherless church.

The tendency to increase the number of preachers by offering practically free tuition, and accepting almost any youth in the college who will apply for admission is certain to complicate the problem of ministerial supply in days to come. A mania for numbers seems now to possess our educational system as it does our evangelism. The churches need to be guarded against those institutions now springing up that propose a short cut to ministerial equipment. The counter tendency among our colleges to raise the standard for admission, and carefully guard the physical, moral and intellectual qualifications of candidates for the ministry is a far more healthy sign than the opening of seminary doors without cost to all who desire a ministerial education. To fill pulpits with half-prepared men or with ill-chosen men is not to solve the problem of ministerial supply, but it is increasing the burdens of ministerial relief.

It is not a question any longer to the thoughtful whether the need of the hour is for better equipped men or for greater numbers. The present scare over the heresies of educated men will pass, as will the exploitation of a few men as models of soundness who have not read a modern book in ten years. Both are the efforts of a few sectarian, unordained bishops to further their own interests. Time, the restorer of the sanity of the multitude, will show that scholarship and faith are in nowise incompatible.

The Jackson Prison Outbreak

The recent notorious outbreak in the state prison at Jackson, Mich., in addition to furnishing material for many sensational newspaper stories, has brought to light many conditions which are worthy of serious consideration. For many years the Jackson institution was a plum for grafters and politicians. Mismanagement of the worst form existed for many years, and a former manager was indicted and sent to a house of correction for irregular conduct while in office. At that time the Jackson prison was a great burden to the state. When the investigation came and the effort was made to put the prison in working order a so-called "new system" was installed. But that organization has been correctly styled a mongrel mixture of the new and the old systems, and while failing to accomplish much that the really progressive new prison methods bring about, it served to prevent any further change. It is really to this doubtful method of prison government that the inmates of the prison are objecting. Unfair discrimination under it is the first and strongest charge the prisoners make, and, while other charges are emphatically denied by the prison authorities, the admission is freely made that discrimination has been prevalent. That this serious condition should have remained without apparent effort to bring about an effectual remedy is a strong indictment of the efficiency of the management. The integrity of the officers is probably beyond reproach, but more zeal has been manifested to make a good showing upon the ledgers than to better the welfare of the men. The people of the state were pleased over the last annual report because, instead of a deficit such as had been an annual feature of the report, a credit balance was shown. But the men are still driven to work by force, with little incentive to do more than a minimum amount of work. A few of the men, not nearly all, received about 10 cents a day on an average for work done in excess of a given amount each day. A few, with little regard to previous record for good behavior, received larger wages on certain tasks, while others, often more worthy, received no compensation whatever. From the disorder at Jackson, attention naturally turns to the Oregon or Colorado systems of compensation for convict labor, systems which have proved so successful financially where annual deficits had formerly been regular. There a convict's compensation for work is much higher. The prisoners have an incentive to work hard and faithfully, and to those with good records, especial privileges are granted. Hundreds work outside the prison entirely and without guard, simply giving their word of honor to make no attempt to escape. The results of this system are remarkable. The inmates are treated like men, are given responsibility and are trusted, and many are made good, honest citizens thereby, instead of sinking into incurable criminality by being herded with others who have already reached that state.

The Summer Slump

The attendance upon church services in New York city during August, was the smallest in many years. Several reasons are given. Possibly the political campaigns may have had something to do by diverting the church-goer's mind from this particular duty; and the hot weather has evidently had its effect. Chicago churches report larger congregations than is usual in the summer time. Extraordinary weather made church-going perfectly comfortable until the first week of September. But in New York conditions seem to have been different. The Churchman thus reports:

> The August attendance in New York city churches has reached its lowest ebb of many years. July attendance was poor, but church sextons, the most enterprising of whom keep close watch on numbers in the congregation, predicted that August would bring buyers of merchandise to the city, and that these out-of-town merchants would bring their wives as they increasingly do, and that the women at least would come to church, and some might bring their husbands. Such has been the experience in former years. Some churches have depended almost wholly on this class, and have on this ground authorized expenditures for securing well-known preachers and extra choristers. The bill of costs has always been paid by the New Yorkers, since visitors, even buyers, are rarely carried away to the point of generous giving on offertory plates. The Fifth avenue Presbyterian Church, famous over the continent for its Sunday services and famous preachers, has not opened its gallery this summer, and on only two Sundays have the downstairs pews been filled. The church seats 2,500. Its attendance averages 700. St. Bartholomew's, with its expensive choir, had 200 to 250 during August Sundays. Trinity has averaged 300. Churches that have made no special provision, but have merely kept open, have not reached the one hundred figure in attendance. St. Thomas' Church had, on Sunday morning last, forty, and Heavenly Rest twenty-five. A dozen of the largest evangelical churches are closed in the Madison avenue and Fifth avenue districts. The reasons given for the unusual low ebb of church attendance are—reaction from religious campaigns, the lack of definite programmes, absorption in politics and the effect of business stagnation.

It must not be for one moment forgotten that the church is a spiritual institution, and that the object of gathering together on Sunday is to sweeten life and inspire the week's action with noble motives.—The Christian Register.

How Moses Handled the Music

An Effective Settlement of Trouble in an Ancient Choir

By William E. Barton

Once upon a time there was a minister whose name was Moses. He was a man of ability, an able administrator and wise leader, and a man of great reputation for tact and patience. He was not notably effective as an orator; no minister ever has been great in all things belonging to his office. Moses was sensitive about his lack of oratorical ability, and knew that people liked to hear his assistant pastor, Rev. Mr. Aaron, better than they liked him. There was an arrangement by which Aaron should do most of the preaching, while Moses attended to the matters of administration, which at that time were very complicated, involving the building of a meeting house, and a very large amount of organizing.

Beginning of Trouble.

The trouble began while Moses was away in the mountains one summer. Aaron took advantage of his absence, in a way that an assistant ought not to do, and introduced a number of important changes in the service. This has been the fault of assistants ever since the Exodus, and I should think by this time they would have learned better. But Aaron yielded to the pressure that was brought upon him by some of those who wanted an enriched service, and he had some pride in the matter himself, and a desire to become a little more prominent. So they changed the service in a number of important respects, and when Moses returned from the mountains things were well established in the new way.

It is an old story, and I have no present purpose of retelling it in full. But one thing has always seemed to me to have been neglected in the expositions I have heard of this narrative, namely, the part which the church music had in the matter.

Never Had a Paid Choir.

Up to this time the children of Israel had never had a paid choir. They had gotten on without it as best they could. Now, in the absence of Moses, they decided that something better was needed in the way of music.

As Moses was returning he heard the music and the significant fact about it is that as soon as he heard the music, he knew that there was trouble ahead.

"And when Joshua heard the noise, he said, unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp."

Moses listened. Then he corrected Joshua. It was not war; not yet. It was music.

"And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome; but the noise of them that sing do I hear."

No wonder that sound struck terror to the heart of Moses. Neither he nor Joshua was afraid of war. But church music was a different matter.

Missed by Commentators.

Thousands and thousands of commentators have read this passage, and scanned its every word and looked it up in their Hebrew lexicons, but I cannot find any of them who has adequately emphasized this fact which lies on the very face of the narrative.

Both Moses and Joshua heard the sound with ominous sinking of the heart, but Moses' heart sank worse than Joshua's. All Joshua thought necessary was to go in and fight. But Moses had some larger appreciation of the difficulty. Weapons of carnal warfare were powerless. It was not the noise of a battle, but that of music.

"The noise of them that sing do I hear!"

It was a terrible thing to hear.

I have heard it, and know how Moses felt.

Moses had a well-earned reputation for meekness. I do not know how he earned it, but he did. I recall very few acts in his career that would be thought meek in a modern minister. But then congregations have grown more exacting since that day. A man could acquire a reputation for meekness and do things that a modern church would not permit in its minister. Still, there must have been some good ground for the opinion which so many people had then and have had since that Moses was a very meek man. Consider that he was considered a meek man, and then measure the provocation in the light of what he did.

Broke all Commandments.

When he heard that singing, and saw the trouble that accompanied it, he broke all the ten commandments at once. His "anger waxed hot." I do not blame him. There were other abuses besides the church music, some of them more flagrant. But it is the music we are talking about.

They had one of the stormiest church meetings on record. Moses walked into the meeting and shouted, "Who is on the Lord's side?"

Some of the officers of the church gathered around him, and little by little others joined them. They were not a majority, but they had their guns with them, which the others had neglected to bring. The majority had been so confident in their strength they did not sufficiently guard their defences. And Moses boldly walking into that church meeting routed his adversaries in one of the ablest coups in all church history.

Music a Mere Incident.

The truth is that the music was a mere incident. The people who thought Moses was not a very able preacher, and who wearied of doing the duties he imposed upon them, attempted to get rid of him during his summer vacation. Even then they gave him credit for having done a good work, but they said his usefulness in that community was at an end. "As for this Moses, who brought us up out of Egypt, we wot not what has become of him." And they did not care what was to become of him. They seldom do care. They proposed to terminate his pastorate abruptly. And all the innovations were mere incidents. I do not like to tell you how far they went in that rascally deal. It is strange that any church would treat any pastor as that one treated Moses. I hope no church would do that now, don't you? You cannot imagine, can you, that while the minister was away, communing with God in the mountains, filling his soul with new messages for his people, and turning homeward with the summer tan on his face and a new breath of heaven in his soul, his people would be plotting against him in that way? No, it is not thinkable. But if it ever should happen, and the good minister should display some little temper, why, that is just what Moses did.

Moses turned three thousand members out of his church just on account of that affair. They left; he stayed. That is where the story plainly classifies itself chronologically. That is where we see plainly that it is ancient history.

You may think I have wandered from my text, that I have forgotten that church music played a part in this story. You are mistaken. I am remembering it all the time. It drops out of the narrative, but I will tell you the rest of the story. And it is true.

The Second Summer.

This affair happened when Moses had been pastor only a matter of two years. It happened in the second summer, which is a time of peril for babies, widowers and pastors. And after the first church meeting that followed the return of the pastor the people gave up their idea that his usefulness was at an end. The people who came to church with their arms in slings, or who went home from church meetings and put a raw beefsteak on their eyes, ceased to think that Moses was too meek a man for that pastorate. They hurried to get over with the friends of the pastor, and to say that while they had previously entertained some doubts about the wisdom of Mr. Moses continuing the pastoral office, it now appeared to them that he had returned with so much vigor that they were disposed to advise the church to retain him, and to define a little more rigidly the sphere of the assistant pastor in the matter of the public services of the church.

Music Omitted from Order of Service.

It was also voted, and so far as the record shows the vote was unanimous, that the pastor should prepare a new order of service; and in that vote not a word was said about music.

Moses was a wise minister. He took his time to work out that new order of service, and he determined that when it was done there should be just as much singing as he wanted and no more. And he had his way about it, and continued as pastor of that church for thirty-eight years after the attempt to oust him. And within six months after the affair, the church was ashamed of itself, and did not like to hear the matter mentioned.

Then Moses resumed his reputation for meekness. No wonder. Any minister can be meek when he is having his own way.

Aaron's Part in the Service.

Now when the new order of service was published there was a good deal in it beside mere preaching. Moses arranged it so that Aaron should have his full share of responsibility and honor, and Aaron did not resign, as at first he had some thought of doing, but stayed by Moses, and helped him to work the matter out. This is much to Aaron's credit, and also to that of Moses.

But what about the singing?

There wasn't any!

Nothing was said about its omission. At that stage of the matter no one dared say anything. Moses was too meek.

I think Moses must have smiled sometimes to think how he could do some things he did and still retain a reputation for meekness. But he did. Many a minister since, nursing some hurt received at the hands of his church, has prayed for grace to be as meek as Moses was. I do not wonder.

But the music went out. You may read the Pentateuch through and you will discover that in the revised order of service there was no church music at all. The vested choir went out, and all that therein was. And the pastor was the foremost man in that church.

Perhaps Moses Went too Far.

I am not advising other ministers to solve the problem in the way Moses did. Personally it seems to me entirely possible that Moses went too far. As I read the book of Leviticus there are several things I would rather spare out of the order of service than the singing. I am not advising other ministers to do as Moses did; I am merely telling the story as it is in the Bible. You may read it there for yourself. If people read their Bibles more it would not be necessary for me to be telling it at all.

But the facts are as I state them. Moses made no provision for music in any form in the order of service of his church adopted after that experience with the singers. They had singing? Doubtless. But it was by permission and not by divine right. And it was distinctly subordinate.

David's Innovations.

David later organized a great choir and orchestra with instruments. But David was a very brave man. Moses had only two instruments, both trumpets, used to call the people together. He had no orchestra in his service. It was David who introduced the brass band, and he had no end of trouble.

But this present story does not concern itself with David. It merely undertakes to tell what the Bible itself tells, that as soon as Moses heard "the noise of them that sing" he knew that there was trouble in camp; and when he revised the order of service he cut out the choir altogether. I am not recommending it, and it might not work now. Not every minister is as meek as Moses.

The Unemployed in the Great Cities

Can They Be Sent to the Country?—Difficulties in the Way

By Charles Stelzle

It's a short trip from the bread-line to the dead-line. When the average man has been out of a job so long that he is compelled to hang around a mission or a bake-shop to get a "hand-out," he's in a fair way of becoming unfit for any kind of a man's job. The man without a job is a menace to himself and to society, and it doesn't matter much whether he lives in swell apartments or loafs on a park bench. But to most of us the "unemployed problem" is limited to the so-called "down and out" —the man who stops us on the street and begs for a night's lodging.

An Editor Quoted.

Said the editor of a semi-society journal recently: "If city authorities were to put the unemployed on labor farms and shut up the cheap lodging houses and the Mills Hotels, they would be doing both the loafers and their municipalities a good turn." This news dispenser of pink tea functions and some other critics of the unemployed really haven't grasped the situation. There are men with families who need to be considered—perfectly decent sort of chaps—and there's the curse of institutionalism in connection with the labor farm or colony which must not be forgotten when one dismisses the subject of the unemployed in this off-hand manner.

There are several other considerations which are usualy overlooked in the average discussion of this question. There are factors both economic and social which persist in asserting themselves in spite of the dilettante effort to send the immigrant and the city laborer "back to the soil," unmindful of the fact that comparatively few of them came from the soil. The tendency of the population is toward the city. According to the last census, the population of the United States as a whole increased 21 per cent; but the increase in the cities of 25,000 and over was 55 per cent, whereas the increase in the rural districts was only about 10 per cent in ten years. Today about one-half the population of this country lives in the city. This tendency will never diminish.

Malthus.

Malthus, the great economist of former days, said that the time would come when we could not supply the people with the necessary food because, he asserted, while the population was growing in geometrical proportions food supply could be produced only in arithmetical ratios. That is, while the population increased in ratios of 1, 2, 4, 16, etc., food could be produced only in ratios of 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. Therefore he prophesied starvation for most of the human race and he welcomed wars and pestilence as visitations of Divine Providence. But his theory hasn't worked out. For in former days it required two-thirds of the population to raise the farm products necessary to supply the country with food, but today, on account of the use of agricultural machinery, it requires only one-third. As a matter of fact, if present available methods were fully utilized, one man could produce enough food to feed forty. But while the introduction of labor-saving machinery multiplies the efficiency of those who remain on the farm, there has been as yet no machine invented which will increase the eating capacity of the rest of the world. Another important element in the case is the fact that for large numbers of men there is work on the farm only during the harvest season, but the farm-hand, like the rest of mankind, must work the year round. At any rate, he must live a fairly normal life. He can not hibernate during the winter when work on the farm is slack. Often he has a family to support and this method of making a living is not only uncertain, but often degrading.

Not Easy to Go to the Country.

But, it may be said, granted that the effort to colonize be futile in view of the factors which are driving men to the city, what is there to prevent the people of the city from accepting temporary work on the farm during a period of business depression? Partly for the reason just given. But there are other considerations. There are two classes of men who would be concerned in such a proposition; first, the skilled artisan, who is out of a job for the time being; and, second, the unskilled laborer, who earns small wages even when he is employed. I can imagine the expert workingman coming back to the city at the end of the harvest season, and attempting to get another job at his trade. "Where did you work last?" the foreman will inquire. "Oh, I was out on a farm," the mechanic will answer—if he has the courage to tell the truth. "On a farm? We're not hiring Rubes—we want skilled men." And no amount of persuasion can make the average foreman believe that the fact that the man before him went to work on a farm rather than loaf in the city is really to his credit.

A Very Real Barrier.

To some this may seem a trivial barrier, but it is a very real one, for both foreman and workman in the city have a feeling of contempt for the "hayseed," be he the original article or merely one who became such as a make-shift. And so the workingman tramps the street, with all the pride of the skilled American workingman—some of it foolish, but some of it most commendable—hoping that "tomorrow" will find him at work at his trade. The unskilled laborer hasn't this obstacle to contend with—at least, not to so great a degree. He could accept a job in the country without the sacrifice of very much pride. But there are even more serious reasons as to why he can not go from the city to the country to help the farmer during the harvest seasons. Anyone who knows the man of the poorer tenement districts is familiar with a pale, narrow-chested individual, who simply could not stand a day in the hot August sun, using a pitchfork or even driving a team. It would be physically impossible for him to make good in a task which would be absolutely new and which would require more muscle than he ever possessed. With him, it would be a matter of endurance, aside from the social questions which are bound to influence him to a considerable degree.

The Immigrant.

There is a possibility that the immigrant may be induced to go to the farm, although the effort to persuade him to do so has not been very successful, largely for the reason that most of the foreigners who are coming to us lived in the city or town back in the fatherland. In several of the colonization schemes for immigrants the foreigners found that they were being exploited by the promoters, with the result that the news was carried to the remotest villages of the country, creating a prejudice against the farming industry. It will take a long time to overcome this feeling.

It should not be considered so marvelous a thing that the city workman will not go to the farm when the country workman is fleeing to the city in such large numbers. After all, the whole matter is principally a question of human nature. We may find fault with it, and persuade ourselves that the city's poor and unemployed are fools, but whatever else they may be they are human, and somehow, they can't very well help being that. To fly in the face of prejudice, pride and all the traditions of city life, requires greater force of character than is usually attributed to poverty-haunted residents of the city's tenements. If they could overcome all the obstacles which stand in the way of a migration to the farm, they would be capable of making a pretty good living in the city, under ordinary circumstances.

What is the Remedy?

What then is the remedy? Certainly not in the wholesale transfer of the city's poor to farm colonies. Many will, undoubtedly, find their way to the country, and there discover life and joy in the open air. But the vast majority will remain in the city. And since they are to remain there, they must be trained to learn the true values. If their lives are unreal, they must be trained to learn the true values. If they are living under conditions which debase and degrade, morally and physically, these conditions must be removed, so that even life in a tenement be made wholesome. If they are in their present situation because of inefficiency, they should be made more competent. In any case the fight will be won or lost in the city. We can not shift the responsibility. The problem is ours. It is ours, whether we accept it or not, for the weal or the woe of every man in the city helps to constitute the life and the thought of the world.

A Knight of the Fourth Estate

By Edgar White

"Superintendent Carmichael was seen at his hotel tonight, and said the verdict at the inquest should not be taken as final, as there was much evidence concerning the accident not procurable in time for the hearing before the coroner. He admitted, however, that it was possible the semaphore at the canal crossing was not set against the Express in time to stop it. Good-by."

The man who had been dictating a railroad accident investigation to the city room of the Morning Star hung up the receiver in the booth and walked over to the hotel counter. He was of medium size, approaching middle age, with the consequent iron, gray frosting the dark hair over the forehead. His face was dark and thoughtful —the look of a man who knew life, and appreciated its sombre riddles.

"Any notables tonight, Jim?" he asked the clerk.

"Not since 8. Colonel Warsaw of the irrigation commission has reserved a room; he'll be in on the Santa Fe in the morning. Here's a letter Congressman Hatcher said to hand you. He left about an hour ago, and said for you to wire him."

The reporter opened the letter while standing at the counter. The communication from the Congressman was an offer of $1,500 a year to act as his private secretary.

"The position will throw you in touch with men who are doing things," wrote Mr. Hatcher, "and you will meet people from every nation. It will be a fine opportunity for a man of your turn. I tried to get to see you today, but you were out of the office when I called. With all respect to the Fourth Estate, the lot of a reporter is little better than that of a slave. He has no time he can call his own, and virtually belongs body and soul to the paper. The game isn't worth what it costs in blood and muscle, and the sacrifice of your time. You're getting along in years—you will pardon this from an old friend, I know—and it behooves you to look out a little for No. 1. You can't be a newspaper reporter all your life. Here in Washington you can have your wife with you, attend social events, have time to attend concerts and entertainments, and sleep at night like a white man. Now, don't get it into your head I'm running your profession down, for I'm not. The making of newspapers is one of the greatest callings there is in the interest of humanity, but you've served your time at it, and can step aside and let some one else take your place with an easy conscience; you've done your duty.

"Now, give this your careful attention, Bob, and then decide to join me. You'll never regret it, and I know your good wife will shout 'Amen.' Wire me tomorrow.

"Yours cordially,

"Hatcher."

Hatcher was a time-tried friend and Bob Stewart knew he meant just what he said. He winced a little, however, at the "slave" comparison. The industrous newsgatherer had never thought of it that way. He was always so busy trying to turn something up for his paper that it had never occurred to him he was toiling for an uncommonly modest compensation. It was true, sadly true, that he wasn't laying anything by; that rent, clothing and grocery bills took every cent he made as regularly as pay day came around, but he felt strong and active, and hoped somehow that in the final reckoning things would work out right. He despised a miser, and that he couldn't save, hadn't worried him much.

But the clear-cut, business-like offer from the well-known and popular congressman aroused him with a jerk. Mr. Hatcher had discussed the situation without gloves, and had told the truth, the honest, blunt, uncomfortable truth. It was as easy to figure as two times two that the job offered would put a good deal more money in his pocket than the job he had, and he wouldn't have to work half so hard.

Stewart loved his work. He had never thought of going into anything else. Once a newspaper man always a newspaper man; until the dreary day when sentence of banishment should be pronounced; then he would join the noble army of exiles; the men who had worked out their brains, leaving only the shell. He could name a score of them who yet hung about the offices, wistfully looking at the men moving briskly along the path that once was theirs.

Here was a chance to sidestep their fate —to break away before night came.

Accept? There could be no question. So eager was he that, though the hour was late, he walked over to the telephone to arouse his wife and tell her the good news. He could hear her glad laughter, laughter strewn with tears, the tears of joy. It was almost unbelievable that they should go to Washington, where she might have him all to herself. She had long been jealous of the inexorable profession which had kept him from her so much. The news he gave brought delightful visions of their honeymoon over again—the first real honeymoon. The happy wife slept no more that night for thinking it over.

The reporter wrote a message gratefully accepting the congressman's offer, and handed it to "Jim" with the request that he give it to the hotel telegrapher as soon as she arrived in the morning.

"By-the-way, Bob," said the clerk, as he took the message, "there's a lady with us tonight who was asking about you—Mrs. Austin of Chicago. You printed a story while she was here searching for her daughter. Mrs. Austin says by that means the daughter was located."

"She was?" said Stewart with sudden interest.

"That's what Mrs. Austin says. The daughter is a beautiful girl of eighteen. She is with her mother, who had not seen her since she was a little girl, when she was kidnaped by parties hired by the girl's uncle. Sort of a family falling out, I guess. If you see them in the morning you'll get a tail-ender for your story as good as the first part. Both declare they will never leave town until they see Bob Stewart."

The reporter walked over to a far corner of the office and sat down. The case narrated by the clerk was one of the multitude that had fallen to him as a gatherer of the day's news. He had attended to it as a matter of course, not as a philanthropist, nor as a Good Samaritan, but simply because it came along with the daily grist and was a story worth the telling.

Then there were the prosecutions of the school-book grafters, which he had virtually caused after a certain representative of the book concern had tried to bribe him to keep the matter out of the paper. He recalled that a grand jury was summoned, and its efforts were nullified because the parties to be investigated had succeeded in buying up four of the jurymen. Then Stewart had gone to work, hunted up convincing evidence, and printed it in his paper. The prosecuting attorney was forced to bow to the public demand for further investigation. Another grand jury was called, the whole matter gone over again, and indictments promptly returned against the manipulators.

An incompetent superintendent had been appointed to manage the poor house, and frightful abuses had followed his supervision. Stewart was admitted in the guise of a pauper, and his story of the outrageous treatment of the helpless ones, submitted upon incontrovertible proof, caused prompt investigation, and the summary dismissal of the incompetent official.

These were merely incidents in the daily campaign of the Fourth Estate, under whose banner the thoughtful-faced man was only a private one of the "rank and file." It mattered not who did these things. That they were done, and well done, was in accord with the code of the paper. Accomplishment was everything; the instrument nothing. The man chosen for this sort of work was not likely to be of the kind who would quarrel with his salary. Compensation had no place in the working out of the assignment; result and that only was the goal.

For the first time in his long career as a reporter it occurred to Stewart that he had not been treated fairly. If he was worth $1,500 a year to write letters and look up facts for a member of congress, the newspaper that had been paying him only $20 a week for all his time while not sleeping was certainly stretching the limits of economy. In a few years he would be an old man, and no one pays old men increased wages. The offer of Congressman Hatcher had come most opportunely, right at the crisis of his life.

His work for the night over, Stewart hastened back to the office to turn in his resignation. He did not want to go home to his wife until he had cut all the bridges behind him; arrange matters so there would be no recanting. As he neared the large building where the "Morning Star's" light glowed brilliantly on the topmost floor, a man lurched out of a saloon and would have fallen into the gutter had not Stewart caught him. A large man wearing a white apron disappeared behind the swinging doors.

"Tommie!" cried Stewart as he looked into the white face of the young man he was steadying on the sidewalk.

"Bob!"

There was a sob in the boy's voice, and an expression of deep shame crept over his face. The older man took him by the arm.

"Come, Tom," he said, "we'll go home now."

"But I got a story to turn in," protested the boy; "I must go up to the office," and he fumbled in his pockets until he found a crumbled mass of note-sheets. Stewart gently took them from his hand, and went with them to a lighted window. Glancing through the miserably scrawled pages, he realized the importance of the matter, and thrust them in his inside pockets.

"I'll take care of these, Tom," said the reporter; "come with me."

Stewart led the cub over to the entrance of the newspaper building, stepped to the

"No," said Paul, "I must confess my eyes were on the priests, not the spectators.'"

"Talavenka was crying all through the ceremony. Her father can not understand her new life. The girl stands alone in the midst of this superstition. What will become of her? The estrangement in the family is one of the most painful things I ever knew. Her mother Schewingoiashchi is the only one who seems kind to her. At times I think Schewingoiashchi is not far from the Kingdom herself. She does not object to Talavenka's baptism. We have talked of that. It will be a part of our service tonight. I must go and get ready.

Paul and Esther and the rest of the party went to Talavenka's house for the evening meal. Masters, who was of the old school of preachers, they learned afterwards had spent the hour before the service out on the edge of the rock a little past the mission chapel, praying in the darkness for the people of Oraibi.

Helen was very eager to go to see Talavenka baptized. During the afternoon she had noticed the girl's grief and had been deeply touched by it. They were of the same age, she had learned from Mrs. Masters. The few words she spoke in English during the midday meal had revealed a quiet dignity and a genuine Christian faith. Already Helen's romantic temperament was constructing a plan to have Talavenka leave Oraibi and finish her education in Milton academy.

"We can carry you over to the chapel all right," her father said. "Where are those young men? I haven't seen Van Shaw or his friends all the afternoon."

"They were there, I saw them," said Walter.

"I saw them on the other side of the plaza," said Bauer who had not lost sight of Van Shaw during the afternoon and had wondered more than once why he was avoiding Helen. He had had his talk with Mrs. Douglas and had been tormented all through that ancient prayer for rain with questions as to his wisdom in telling some things to Helen's mother. But he was not given to doubt concerning his motives and in this particular instance he had no hesitation over his own absolutely clean and disinterested motive. He wanted Helen to escape the horror of a union with a degenerate mind and heart as he knew they existed in Van Shaw's character and his own feeling for her did not occupy a prominent place in his motive. Of that much he was sure and it helped him somewhat to get through one of the most trying experiences of his life.

Bauer went on to say to Mr. Douglas that he had seen Van Shaw and his two friends go down the trail to their wagons and had not seen them come back up the rock. So Paul and Walter, Clifford and Felix took Helen over to the mission chapel towards which various groups could be seen moving through the unlighted spaces of Oraibi's crooked and narrow windings.

The chapel had been built by a small missionary society ambitious to signalize its existence by doing something desperately hard in a corner of the world where no missionary work had ever been done. The missionary in charge had labored several years with that marvelous patience and persistence which nothing but the history of missions in this old world has ever recorded. And as a result of his work Talavenka had come into the light. She had spent two winters at the mission in Tolchaco and Masters had shaped and enlarged the faith that first had begun to glow on the grey rock of Oraibi. And the missionary had been planning to have Masters hold this special service and baptize Talavenka from the time he heard of his coming up to the snake dance.

Masters found a place on one end of the little platform for Helen's cot where she lay propped up in comfortable fashion. The room was very small and it filled up rapidly. When it would hold no more it is doubtful if any man with a message ever faced a more mixed or astonishing audience.

There were native Hopis, old men and women who did not understand a word of English. Navajo visitors, men who never appeared at Oraibi except once in two years. Paul recognized one man whom Masters had pointed out one day at Tolchaco as a notorious gambler and horse trader, known all over the painted desert as "Iadaka" the gambler; there were traders from the different government posts; a few teachers from the government schools; a bunch of cowboys from Flagstaff; half a dozen Apaches who had come up to Oraibi from an encampment near the Bottomless Pits; a dozen tourists from a half dozen different cities in the east attracted from tourist curiosity; three interpreters, one of whom happened to be in government employ and had been caught at Oraibi and detained there by an accident to his team on the way to Shungapavi. Masters knew him and asked him to come in and help at the service.

Besides this miscellaneous and polygot audience inside the room, Helen soon became aware of nearly as many more spectators and listeners outside the building crowded about the open windows. The night was warm and still. The chapel had three windows on each side, and two at the rear behind the platform, and at each opening dark faces of various nationalities grouped and peered in with stoical or wondering interest. After the service had begun Helen suddenly became aware of the presence of Van Shaw and his two friends. They had evidently finished their supper and camp work and come back up the rock to be present at the chapel service but had been too late to get inside. Helen felt Van Shaw's gaze directed constantly at herself. He had secured a position close up to the second window from the platform. Helen again had that curious blending of anger and exultation, of shame and gratified vanity as if there were forces at work in her at war with one another tempting and antagonistic, attractive and repellant. But after one look had been exchanged between her and Van Shaw she changed her position on the cot so that she was partly hidden from him by a lamp which stood on one corner of the little parlour organ of the platform.

Do you know of any greater heroes than the heroes of the cross? These are the undaunted, unterrified, passion-filled souls of the earth. Masters personified the very spirit of aggressive, human, loving Christianity. That strange room full of humanity would have appalled anyone but a real soul-hungry man. What could anyone do with it? Century old vices and superstitions, brutal contempt for anything but coarse pleasures, stolid indifference to God, measureless egotism and age-long selfishness looked at him from the faces in the room and at the windows, from "Iadaka" and the wrinkled Hopis, from the sentimental tourist girl and Van Shaw and his two friends, from the dull visaged Apaches and the smirking traders, one of whom, to Master's own knowledge, had for years been cheating the rug weavers all the way from Black Bear Canon to the Spanish Peaks.

And yet for some reason or a number of reasons, these humans were all here in front of him and as he looked at them, Masters had soul hunger for them. He loved the multitude. And it never entered his simple thought that anything else was possible, but that in the long run they would all have to go down before the conquering Carpenter's Son. Yes, even old "Iadaka." He would some day see the light and he would walk and run all the way from Crested Buttes to the Bottomless Pit and throw his da'aka in there and kneel at Jesus' feet and call him Lord. Have not the peoples of the earth been doing that all through the ages? Is not the miracle of regeneration greatest of all miracles since Jesus lived? Is anything too hard for God?

So Masters' simple unswerving faith spoke that night. He told in the simplest possible way the story of the cross. The old, old story that is changing the history of the world every day. The old story that is not afraid of modern philosophy, nor antique prejudice nor even the scoffing and sneering of Athens and the jeers of Vanity Fair and the complacent self-satisfaction of the modern Pharisee.

Then he told Talavenka's story as he knew she would be willing to have it told. The Hopi girl had sat on the front seat close to the platform. She was dressed in white and Helen wondered with herself more than once if Talavenka was like other girls and really knew or understood how marvelous was her black hair and her perfect colored skin. And then almost as if someone had asked her, Helen asked herself if Talavenka had ever known a lover and if the great romance of life could come to her now that she had cut herself off from her people, and the swift runner in the corn dance might no longer look for her to come out in the grey morning and with the other maidens snatch from his arms the cool dew washed corn leaves and from his glowing eye the message which is the same between youths and maidens the world over.

But Talavenka was conscious herself of no other thought here to-night in the mission chapel at Oraibi. Masters spoke to her of her faith and asked her a few questions. The girl's face shone with intelligent af-

WOMEN IN THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

A recent dispatch says that the Democratic National Committee, Fifth avenue building, New York City has been digesting the figures of the census bureau over the estimated number of voters in November. The figures are based on information secured in the past three weeks from every state in the Union.

The total vote is estimated at about 24,-335,000, as against 14,888,442 cast for the presidential election in 1908. In six western states 1,347,00 women will vote for President.

This nearly one million and a half of enfranchized women seems to be the most persuasive argument that has yet been presented to the political powers that be in favor of women suffrage.

Four years ago, in the campaign of 1908, no big political party, or big politician concerned themselves about what women thought or did—they regarded woman suffrage as an amusing joke, a sentimental theory, or a plain nuisance. Women received no recognition in political conventions from political parties or from politicians. Since the last presidential election, the great states of California and Washington have given their women full suffrage, and they will cast their first presidential vote this fall.

You mark the consideration, the difference with which all the three great political parties are treating women. In the National Convention of the Progresive Party many women were seated as delegates. A plank for woman suffrage was put in this platform. A woman, Jane Addams, seconded the nomination of Theodore Roosevelt for President—and her speech was easily the most notable one of the convention. She has been made a member of the Progressive National Committee. Mr. Rosevelt evidently considers Miss Addams, and those she represents, as one of his greatest assets, and uses her name so often in his public addresses that the venerable President Eliot, of Harvard, has characterized it in a newspaper interview, as a breach of good taste.

The Republican party has its Woman's Advisory Committee. The Democratic party has its Woman's National Wilson and Marshall League, with Mrs. Borden Harriman as president. In view of this sudden conversion, the editor of the New York Evening Journal gives this sensible advice:

"Women, politicians realize your importance because you yourself have begun to realize your power. Work and fight for female suffrage everywhere. Don't allow the men exclusively to decide what shall be done with the sons and daughters that you bring into the world. Don't permit the men to decide on peace and war while you create every soldier that lies dead when the war is over. Don't allow the men exclusively to settle the question of taxation by government and by trusts when the taxes come out of your pockets, out of the money you need for your children. Don't be classed any longer with the idiots and the Indians, unfit to vote. Let the attitude of the three presidential canidates, suddenly, violently interested in you, teach you a lesson. The way for women to be considered and to get their rights and their share in government is through the ballot-box and government control. Now that women begin to vote women are considered. When 100 per cent of the women are permited to vote all women and children will be at least 100 per cent better off. The suffrage movement has accomplished wonders alread; it will do infinitely more. Every intelligent women must be in favor of votes for women. The woman who opposes suffrage ma be very virtuos and well meaning, but she is as ignorant and as childish as those negro slaves who fought against their own freedom in the da's of the Civil War."

A Home Fairy

Elsie and her mother sat for a few minutes after breakfast on the porch. The coolness of the breeze sweeping through it was pleasant, for outside the sun already poured down fiercely, and there was every promise of a hot day.

"If only I could have my wish," said Elsie. "O I know what I would wish."

"What would you wish?"

"First, I'd wish that a little fairy would appear—yes, I'd have her poising right on the top of that lilac bush; she would be such a feather-weight, you know, that it wouldn't bend even the smallest twig. And she'd say, 'What can I do for you this morning?' And I'd say, 'Please hold out that nice little wand of yours, and set the sitting room and the library to rights in a minute. Dust all the corners, and shake the little rugs, and sweep the porch.' When that was done, I'd say, 'Please go to my room and tidy it up, and when you've done leave a beautiful new dress for me to wear to the lawn party this afternoon.' Then I'd go out and lie all the morning in the hammock. I'd have the fairy fix the flowers on the dinner table so that I wouldn't have to move. I'd read that good story I haven't had time for, or if Janet came over, we'd just lounge about and talk. After dinner I'd dress and go to the lawn party. I'd have the fairy have a carriage ready to take me; and in the evening I'd have her by me and read to grandmother, while the real I could run over to Janet's and have a good time there. Now"—Elsie laughed at the pleasant picture she had drawn, "wouldn't that be a nice day? What would you wish for, mother?"

"Well," mother was ready to enter into the little girl's humor, "I usually have too much to think of to spend much time in wishing but, one thing I am sure, I should want my fairy to have two wands instead of one."

"O mother, you expect a good deal. One could do all I ask for; but go on."

"I shouldn't want even to tell her what I would like to have done, for my fairy would know without any telling. She would skip about with such willing hands and such a happy face and such a cheery song as would put cheer into the heart of everyone in the house. She would put your room in order, too—not slighting anything, but making it just the sweet, tidy room that every dear little maid ought to have. All the time she would still be on the lookout, with a pair of the dearest, brightest eyes in the world, for things she might see to be done without waiting to be told."

"You want your fairy to do just what I want mine to do," commented Elsie.

"The dining-room would smile a welcome to everyone who came into it, so much pains would she take with the flowers—not hastily cramming them into vases. After dinner I should feel like saying, 'My dear little fairy, you have been such a willing comfort to everybody all the morning that I think it only fair that you should have a little recreation.' So my fairy would go to the lawn party."

"O mother, how you are talking! I thought you meant it all seriously."

"I never meant anything more seriously in my life," said mother; then going on as if she had not been interrupted: "My fairy would carry all her sweet, loving kindness with her, with the result that all who came in her way would feel it good to be near her. She would not remain with just the girls she liked best to be with, but would encourage the shy ones, and have pleasant words for those who might feel strange or neglected. When she came home, it would still be with a loving spirit, prompting her to let those who loved her there have a share in her good times by her account of them. She would gently wait on grandmother, finishing up her day with the reading, with which no one can please grandmother so well."

Elsie shook her head a little, then smiled a little, then sat for a while in deep thought, saying at length as she arose: "Well, mother, I don't think there is much chance of my fairy coming to wait on such a lazy thing as I made out myself to be. But I do think that your fairy might be expected to be somewhere about. She ought not to be an impossible fairy. Perhaps if I were to try, and I think I will, I might be able to be and to do all that you would wish and expect of your little fairy."

Mother kissed the two little "wands" as they went about their sweet home magic.—Journal and Home Messenger.

The Virtues of Tact

Tact is an indescribable art of saying or doing the right thing in the right place and in the right way, and it is an instinct rather than a cultivated grace. Tact seems heaven-born. A veritable woman of tact is the best type of a Christian. She is unselfish and courteous under all circumstances. Tact is a most useful ally of truth. It prevents the infliction of a wound.

How often we think of the story of the fairy. A fairy appeared to a young mother of three lovely little children—two girls and one boy. The fairy agreed to bestow with her fairy wand a gift upon each child upon one condition—that the mother should choose the gifts for the elder children but she should be allowed to choose for the babe at the mother's breast. The mother consented. For her son she chose genius—for the elder daughter, beauty. "Now," said the fairy, "for the dear little babe I choose tact." "Ah!" says the young mother, with a clouded brow, "give her something better, I pray you." "Wait and see," said the fairy; "I consider hers the best choice." As years went by the mother found that little Grace had the priceless attraction—beauty and genius paled in contrast with the virtues of tact—which is a treasure that never loses lustre, and adds so much to the sweetness and happiness of life.

C. W. Dean and Clark Bower are making a tour of Colorado churches in the interest of the Sunday-school work.

The annual convention of Western Pennsylvania Missionary Society will be held at Allegheny, First Church, Sept. 24-26.

Westport, Ind., Church dedicated a new edifice last Sunday. J. V. Coombs of Danville, Ind., assisted the pastor, M. R. Scott.

S. G. Fisher says "a fine people and a great field" after the first two Sundays of his new pastorate at Portland Avenue church, Minneapolis.

Claire Waite's pulpit at Central Church, Cincinnati, was supplied during his vacation by I. N. McCash, A. McLean, E. W. Thornton and Prof. Arthur Holmes.

Chancellor William Oeschger spoke at the laying of the corner-stone of a new edifice for First Church, Kearney, Neb., recently. The house is to cost $25,000. E. M. Johnson is pastor.

Secretary McCash wires from Philadelphia that he has just received an annuity gift of $8,500 for American missions, and that this is the second gift on the annuity plan from the same person.

The decennial convention of Filipino Disciples will meet in Manila Oct. 11 to 13, to celebrate the first ten years of history in the Philippines. Preparations are being made for a large attendance.

E. A. Hibler of Pittsburg, preaching in Warren, O., Sept. 8, spoke an inhibitive admonition with respect to what he called "boom methods of work." "Endeavor booms," he said, "adult class booms, brotherhood booms and all other booms are dangerous. I am for growth but not dangerous booms."

Upon the withdrawal of S. B. Braden from the pastorate of the church at Edon, O., the Methodist church joined with the Disciples in a farewell reception to him. In the final report of this pastorate, after three years of service, it is stated that some sixty persons had been added to the church and "a bitter sectarian feeling overcome."

During the absence of James M. Philputt, pastor of Central Church, New York, his pulpit was supplied for July and August by W. E. Holloway, pastor of First Church, Scranton, Pa. While in New York Mr. Holloway took some special study in the summer school of Columbia University. His work with the church was entirely satisfactory.

The Phillips Bible Institute of Canton, O., was opened for its first year's work Tuesday, Sept. 10. Over 200 students are enrolled in all departments. Many of the students in the night classes are members of other churches. Dean Pierce, Pastor P. H. Welshimer and Mr. Percy M. Kendall, musical director, made addresses. The Institute has purchased a lot adjoining the church and announces its purpose to erect a building thereon.

New College Opened.

The Spokane, (Wash.), Bible College was opened with ceremonies of which B. E. Utz was leader, the first week in September. J. E. Davis, pastor Central Church, J. W. Allen and others also spoke. Professor Russell Morrison of the department of sacred music arranged special music for the event. It seems to be the intention of the founders of this school to make it a department of a "Spokane University" ultimately to be organized. It is reported that a fifty thousand dollar gift has already been pledged.

Canton, Ohio, Activities.

Miss Hazel Stanley of Greenfield, Ind., has been called to the position of pastoral helper in First Church, Canton, O. She succeeds Miss Catherine E. Staub, who, after ten years of service, resigned on account of the illness of her mother. Miss Stanley was formerly a teacher in the mission school at Hazelgreen, Ky. She began her services with the Canton church Sept. 1. P. H. Welshimer, pastor at Canton, was Sunday-school and Bible lecturer at the Chautauqua at Ames, Ia., Aug. 18 to 23.

An Extraordinary Golden Wedding.

Central Church, New York City, has sent out invitations to a reception for Sept. 17, 1912, given in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Christie, whose entire married life has been spent together in the life of Central Church. Mr. Christie has been an office bearer in Central Church since 1854. The lives of this honored pair have been so interwoven in the fabric of the church of Disciples in New York that it is hard to think of Robert Christie without thinking of the church and no one can think of the church without thinking of Robert Christie. The brotherhood the country over rejoices in these fifty golden years of domestic felicity and Christian service and extends its congratulations.

Disciples at Winona Bible Conference.

The Disciples were represented in the Winona Bible conference held at Winona, Ind., Aug. 23 to Sept. 1, by I. J. Spencer of Lexington, Ky., upon the general program; W. C. Pearce, representing the International Sunday-school Association; Dr. Yukati Minakuchi, representing the Men and Religion Forward Movement; and Herbert Yeuell, in the Interdenominational Conference of Evangelists. In response to the request of the management that each denomination represented elect a denominational conference chairman, G. I. Hoover of Tipton, Ind., was elected for the Disciples of Christ for the ensuing year. Among other ministers present were Idleman of Des Moines, Burnham and Golden of Springfield, Ill., Jabez Hall, Winders, Trusty. Huston and Murray of Indianapolis, Casselberry of Tennessee, Abberley of Cincinnati, Percy Kendall of Canton, Speer of Toledo, and Bryan of Youngstown, O., Cauble of Martinsville, Rose of Warsaw, Buckley of Ft. Wayne, Yocum of Rushville, Jones of Anderson, Jarrett of Goshen, and Burkhardt of Frankfort, Ind.

Disciples and Congregationalists Veto Union.

The church union proposition for the temporary merging of the Congregational and Disciple churches of Iowa City, Ia., explained some weeks since in these columns, was voted down by an overwhelming majority of both congregations Sept. 1. The votes were on two different points: For or against union, and willingness to support the union if it were ordered by a vote of the majority. On the point of actual union, the voting was overwhelmingly against that proposition, in each church. The figures were much alike in proportion and size in the two churches. Following is the vote: Congregationalists—48 for union and 114 against. Disciples—87 for union and 117 against. A number of voters in either church expressed a willingness to support the cause, if it were decided to unite, but many declined to be bound to support an amalgamated church. The heavy vote in each church is a noteworthy evidence of the deep interest taken in the proposal, and the largest vote cast on any question in years proves that the churches were truly aroused. Nearly 230 voted in the Christian church and the Congregationalists were not far behind. The churches will continue in their separate ways as heretofore.

Six Years in Orange.

The resignation of L. N. D. Wells from the pastorate of East Orange, N. J., as announced in these columns recently, to accept a call to Akron, O., Church, gives occasion to record the notable record of his six years at East Orange. At the beginning of his ministry there the church in East Orange had a membership of 138, and the meetings were held in a small chapel. Shortly after his coming the little building was moved two blocks away and is now rented by the church for business purposes. A new building was erected on the original site, and is valued at $50,000. It was dedicated in 1908. The membership has increased to over 500. During Mr. Wells' administration over 520 additions have been made to the membership. The Sunday-school is one of the largest in the Oranges, with a total membership of 650. Mr. Wells was graduated from the College of the Disciples in St. Thomas, Ontario, Canada, in 1900. In 1902 he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts at Bethany College, and the year following the degree of Master of Arts. In 1910 he was graduated from Union Theological Seminary in New York. First Church, Akron, O., exceeded all the other churches in missionary offerings last year, giving $3,800 for the year. The membership of the church is about 1,800.

Church Extension News

The reports from our annual offering continue to show a widespread interest in reaching the million dollar fund for church extension. The great majority of the churches that have reported thus far have either raised or exceeded their apportionments. It should be remembered that about 1,500 churches upon whom the board felt they could count positively for offerings were apportioned enough to complete the million. The board believes that this apportionment was not unreasonable, and we pray that all the churches will raise their amounts and that many churches that never gave will respond with an offering.

First Church, St. Paul., Minn., will send over $50. Central Church, St. Paul, will send $30. At the Footville convention in Wisconsin every church that had a representative agreed to reach the million dollar mark.

In reaching the million dollars, we ought to have a large number of contributions from individuals all over the United States and Canada. Money could be sent on the annuity plan and our board will pay 6 per cent on all annuity gifts, if the donors are fifty years old or more than fifty. Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to help build churches and your money is therefore housing homeless brethren while it is earning you an income of 6 per cent. Remember to remit to:

G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and be sure to send your offerings before the 30th of September. The offerings should reach Kansas City by the 30th.

The Final Appeal

This is the final appeal of the Foreign Society for the current missionary year. The books close the 30th day of this month. Let this be carefully noted.

The returns for the first twelve days of September are most gratifying. The churches gave $6,470, a gain of $3,975; the Sunday-schools gave $3,083, a gain of $2,222; personal offerings amounted to $6,695, a gain of $4,102. The total gifts for the twelve days amounted to $27,087, a gain of $17,453. This is a fine gain for twelve days, and we are very thankful. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools.

Testing Days.

The next eighteen days are the testing period. During the corresponding eighteen days last year the receipts amounted to $100,141. Some churches and Sunday-schools put off sending until the last hour. This is not the best way.

A Great Week.

In 1911 during the last week of September the receipts amounted to $79,493, or more than $10,000 per day. And on the 30th day of September, in one day, the receipts ran up to $21,164. That week was the greatest the Foreign Society ever experienced.

Expecting More.

But we are expecting more this year. The teaching of the scriptures and the very logic of our plea must make our people essentially a missionary people. Without the missionary passion of the apostles and of the fathers of this restoration movement this great plea will perish from the earth.

Please Act at Once.

Will you not send your offering at once? We hope every church and Sunday-school and Endeavor society and personal friend of the work will respond. There is widespread interest in the final outcome. The missionaries are watching our movements. Our Lord stands over against the treasury. Let us do our best. This is our final exhortation for this missionary year.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Really, $6,400 for $2,400!

Here is the most extraordinary situation that ever confronted one of our national societies. The Board of Ministerial Relief needs $4500 September receipts to meet the conditions of a special additional gift of $4000.

In 1911 the regular receipts, aside from bequests, were $1800 and last year $2400. Continuing the same growth the churches ought to send in $3000 this month. But to be safe we count on only the average of two years, of $2100. and must secure in extra gifts from churches and individuals $2400.

The first man to whom the matter was mentioned took only five minutes to decide upon an extra offering of $100. This hint ought to be sufficient to move a score of others to follow his example and hundreds to send smaller amounts to make assurance doubly sure.

Also. There is a premium of 20 per cent on every dollar we raise beyond $20,000 and up to $30,000, by the same generous proposition that pledged the $4,000. Where else can the saint who is prayerfully considering $1,000 of fellowship with the Christian ministry secure such a large immediate increment?

Please make exchange payable to the Board of Ministerial Relief and mail to 120 East Market street, Indianapolis, Ind. President Orcutt will send a receipt at once.

W. R. WARREN, Secretary.

Normal Church building is rapidly approaching completion and the structure is said to be more than fulfilling expectations in its architectural design. The pastor, E. A. Gillilland, and the congregation are unitedly hurrying its completion.

Charles A. Stevens, pastor at Sterling receives most generous and discriminating praise for his sermon on Labor Day at a union meeting of the churches. The local paper in its preface to a lengthy report of the sermon says, "The fact that Rev. Mr. Stevens has been employed in various trades, that of a tanner, a brick mason, a stone mason, wood chopper and other kinds of labor, and the fact that he was first a stone mason and afterwards a minister, resulted in a large audience hearing his remarkable address. It reminded some of the audience of the great address that Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, delivered in the Academy of Music here when Union Labor was in its zenith in this city a number of years ago."

After a truly notable ministry at Douglas Park Church, Chicago, Vaughan Dabney has resigned to accept a fellowship in Harvard University. Mr. Dabney has wrought success out of most unencouraging conditions at Douglas Park. The story of his efficient and fruitful leadership has been told more than once in these pages. He leaves the congregation strong and self-reliant though much depressed by his departure. It is likely that a new leader will be secured to begin work at once. Mr. Dabney is a graduate of Bethany College. Last spring he received the B. D. degree from Chicago Theological Seminary. All who hope for a long and fruitful ministry for him will be reassured to know that he has withstood the temptation of youthful success and chosen to thoroughly equip himself for the highest service.

Secretary's Letter.

The state convention at Centralia has already been well reported by our editors. It was one of the very best in years. The spirit of kindness and brotherly love pervaded every session. There was not a jar.

The officers elected were: President of the convention, W. W. Weedon, Mt. Carmel; Vice-President, Edgar DeWitt Jones, Bloomington; Recording Secretaries, A. L. Huff, Centralia, and E. M. Smith, Decatur. W. H. Cannon, Pittsfield, E. A. Gilliland, Bloomington, and W. W. Sniff, Paris, were re-elected for three years on the Board of Directors.

J. Fred Jones, field secretary; W. D. Deweese, office secretary-treasurer; and Clarence L. DePew, Bible-school superintendent, were re-employed for another year.

Did your church send the dollar for convention expenses? Just ask the brethren for it and they will cheerfully respond. It is not very much but each dollar helps. A dollar bill or personal check.

E. W. Allen and the Central Church, Decatur, will be a new Living Link with our society this ytar in supporting the East Side Mission Church in their city. This is admirable. The East Side Church occupies a splendid field, and Mr. Allen will preach for them on Sunday afternoons while they are paying off their church debt. He is acting the "Big Brother," as he really is.

The Sciota folks, J. F. Smith, minister, will dedicate their new house Sept. 29th, with G. L. Snively in charge. It is a modern brick building and the church is in fine condition. Bro. Snively will follow with a meeting.

H. J. Hostetler, of Newman, has taken the work in our new mission church at Monticello.

The next matter of great importance is to make preparation for the proper observance of Illinois Day. A few churches took the "double up" plan on the May offering, while a great many did not. Keep in mind November 3, Illinois Day.

Carlock Church, Miss Parke minister, have decided to build a new house.

J. FRED JONES,
W. D. DEWEESE.

The High Calling

fection for her Redeemer and then the missionary rose and held the baptismal bowl. Talavenka kneeled between him and Masters, Elijah Clifford with the tear in his eye standing by Miss Gray as if naturally their common interest in Talavenka and knowledge of her history made their mutual nearness a natural thing. Masters touched Talavenka's forehead with the water and said in a voice that trembled for the first time that night, "Talavenka, I baptize thee because of thy faith in the Lord Jesus, into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

All through the service Masters had spoken through one or the other of the interpreters. In turn the Hopis, the Navajos, and the Ajaches had heard of Jesus and what he had said had been listened to in some instances with evident eagerness. But the baptism of Talavenka impressed all alike. Even the stolid imagination of the trader from Red Stone Tanks could understand a little of the significance of what was going on there that night when the first Hopi maiden was being baptised into a religion which her ancestors for centuries had known nothing about.

They sang "My Faith looks up to Thee," and after a prayer by Miss Gray, which was so tender it made Helen cry, the meeting was over.

The people went out slowly. Those who knew Talavenka came up to see her. Her mother had sat still as if graven there all through the evening. Suddenly she drew her shawl over her head and rose and went out. Talavenka trembled as she watched her. "My mother!" was all she said. It was a whole volume of longing for her redemption. Helen heard her and held out her hand to her as she stood there near the little platform. And the two girls, one born in Christian civilization, nurtured in soft and comfortable ways, and the other who first drew breath in a dark and filthy corner of a stone hut on this treeless rock, drew near together and the Christian faith of each swiftly bridged over all the centuries of difference in matters of language, customs and ceremonies. For is it not beautifully true that when Jesus enters a life it becomes a part of all life everywhere, and there is no longer any Greek or Jew, neither Barbarian, Scythian, bondman or freeman, but all are one.

At that instant Van Shaw and his friends came down the aisle of the little room. They had crowded in as soon as enough people had gone out. They came up now, greeting the other tourists, some of whom they had met for the first time that afternoon.

Van Shaw, however, seemed especially anxious to reach the spot where Mrs. Douglas was standing talking with one of the government teachers from Kean's Canon. In passing one of the tourists who was in the middle of the aisle, Van Shaw came face to face with Bauer, and to Bauer's tremendous astonishment Van Shaw said at once in a threatening tone—which, however, he guarded so as not to be heard by anyone else:

"I understand you have been meddling in my affairs. I consider it a mighty sneaking thing for you to do and I want you to understand I won't—"

Bauer recovered his composure quickly as he interrupted Van Shaw.

"We can't very well discuss this matter in here."

"I want a word with Mrs. Douglas first," said Van Shaw.

But Bauer stepped in front of him and said:

"I think you had better have a word with me first."

Van Shaw looked at him uncertainly and then turned and walked out of the chapel. Bauer followed him immediately.

The only light out on the rock was starlight. Darkness covered the blurred outline of Oraibi's houses, with only an occasional point of light here and there, or the sudden glow from some kiva as the opening reflected the fire at the bottom.

Van Shaw walked slowly as if by appointment out to the edge of the rock. When he stopped, Bauer was close by him. In the mist far below a red glow marked the camp by the Oraibi Wash. The night was very still and they were almost near enough to the chapel to distinguish the sound of voices within.

elevator and said "down." The man in charge of the "lift" looked surprised, but obeyed. The two men alighted in the basement, where men were busily getting the big printing machines ready for the first edition. In one corner was a work-bench, with an electric light over it. Stewart took out some note-paper, and began writing from the young reporter's notes. Tom sat on a box nearby, his head in his hands. None of the busy workmen in the press-room paid any attention to them.

Stewart wrote industriously for half an hour, and then scrutinized his work.

"Yes, Bob."

GRAY & CO. PLATING WORKS 1297 Gray Building, CINCINNATI, O.

The still half-intoxicated youth got up and took the manuscript.

"Fine, Bob!" he exclaimed. "Ten times better'n I could have made it. Shall I take it up?"

He staggered toward his friend, who said:

"No; you'll wait on the main floor for me. I'll be right back."

"All right, Bob."

The elevator was stopped at the ground floor for the young man to get out, and then continued on its journey to the top floor with Stewart. Passing through the large composing room, with its long line of clicking machines, Stewart entered the editorial room. There was an army of shirt-sleeved workers, busy at desk, typewriter and telegraph, gathering up the fag-ends of the day's news. They paid no attention to him. He looked wistfully at the animated scene, the earnest young faces, intent on their work, the hurrying messenger and proof boys—a fascinating panorama of which he had once been a part, and of which he was proud. But tonight it was different; these young men, fast growing old under the remorseless lash of the Fourth Estate, were as slaves, doomed to a life in shackles, the irons knitting closer day by day. The old reporter could hardly restrain an impulse to cry out a warning to tell them the utter folly of it all.

Stewart made his way to the city editor's desk. The city editor was an older man than Stewart, a man who had fought his way all along the line to his present high position—the one which controlled the paper's influence in the great city where it was published. Tonight he seemed strangely old and haggard, but he turned to Stewart with a kindly smile:

"Thought you were through, Bob," he said.

"I am, but I met Tom down street, and——"

"I see. Hand it over."

Stewart laid the copy in the city editor's hands.

"You're a good friend to that lad, Bob," the editor remarked as he glanced through the pages. "But I'm afraid he'll never quit."

"Don't say that, Mr. James," said Stewart earnestly "His mother—you know."

"Yes. But if he ever cuts it out it will be more on your account than hers—he'd rather she saw him drunk than you."

The city editor's observation came like a blow. It was as a forbidding barrier stretched across the pathway of his new hope. It clung to him during the homeward journey with his almost helpless comrade of the press. The boy nestled up to him in the street car, talking brokenly, explaining and promising to do better. Stewart never censured him; it was not his way. Two years before he had picked the lad up in a saloon, and because of his good education and manly ways had found him a job on the paper. The boy had made good; but two or three times of late he had

The mother was waiting, as she always was. Stewart did not accompany her son to the door, but observed him from the shadow of a tree. As the boy staggered at the threshold, Mrs. Baxter asked:

"Who came with you, son?"

"Bob."

"Where is he?"

"Not far, I guess. I'm sorry, mother—it will never happen again."

"Mr. Stewart!" she called.

The reporter had heard the conversation. He came out from the shadow and stood on the doorstep. The old lady took his hand and held to it.

"I thank you, sir," she said in deeply earnest tones. "I believe the good God has sent you to me to help me save my boy."

In the gray dawn Bob and his wife talked over the incidents of the night, reasoning them out as they did all problems of their little world. The result was unanimous. There would be no trip to Washington, no social entertainments, no hours of pleasure in each other's society; no money laid by for the bitter day. With a holy light in their eyes they walked with arms entwined to the telephone in the hall, and there the reporter called up "Jim," the hotel clerk, and requested him not to send the dispatch to Congressman Hatcher.

When Stewart entered the office the following afternoon he found an envelope on his desk. In it was this writing on the paper's stationery:

"With the resignation of Mr. Gerald James, effective the first of the month, you will assume the position of city editor, with a salary of $40 per week.

"JOSEPH HAMPTON,
"Managing Editor."

Stewart looked about the big room where the "slaves" were toiling and the boys running to and fro. From across the corridor came the rhythmic clatter of the linotypes. Far down in the depths below the presses rumbled on the weekly edition. The air was charged with human electrical energy—the joy of doing something worth while.

"What a fool I was," murmured the thoughtful-faced man who was a part of all this, "to imagine I could have been satisfied anywhere else."

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

A Unique Mission Study Tour

Reported in a Series of

Fascinating and Authoritative Articles

in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Soon to Begin Continuing Nearly a Year

No feature of American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by PROFESSOR H. L. WILLETT from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett is now forming the personnel of the class which he is to take through Japan, China, Korea, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. The party will sail September 29, and will spend eight months, not in casual sight-seeing but in earnest study of the social and moral conditions of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission both in purpose and plan is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature.

Facts about the missionaries.
Facts about the Oriental religions.
Facts about Oriental social conditions.
Facts about Oriental types of civilization.
Facts bearing upon the practice of Christian Union on the mission field.
Facts as to the Church in the mission field.

Facts, gathered at first hand, by a competent and discriminating observer, and reported in fearless and graphic fashion, are what the Christian people of the Occident want.

This they will receive through Dr. Willett's articles.

Present readers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will do their friends an important favor by calling their attention to Dr. Willett's Travel Story and advising them to subscribe

Self-Sacrifice and Self-Culture

MAETERLINCK HAS PRESERVED TO US the legend of the keeper of the lighthouse who gave to the poor in the cabins about him the oil of the mighty lanterns that served to illumine the sea. "In the soul that is noble," he says, "altruism must, without doubt, be always the center of gravity; but the weak soul is apt to lose itself in others, whereas it is in others that the strong soul discovers itself. The immaterial force that shines in our heart must shine, first of all, for itself; for in this condition alone shall it shine for others as well. But see that you give not away the oil of your lamp, though your lamp be never so small; let your gift be the flame, its crown."

This problem of striking a balance between self-culture and self-sacrifice is the most essential problem of our moral life. Sheer selfishness, we know, shrivels the soul and the soul's world. But there is also a kind of self-giving which exhausts the soul and wastes its powers. Often self-sacrifice is hardly more than the helpless raising of the withered arm of resignation. The effectiveness of self-giving depends on there being a self worth giving. Our spiritual teachers exhort us to give, to do, to spend, to deny ourselves, but fail all too often to make it clear that we must acquire a self, that we must possess and keep an individuality whose value we can ourselves appreciate ere it can have value to others. To overlook the development of this self, to fail to organize the means for its constant renewal, is a stupid and often a tragic moral blunder.

In Jesus we have the supreme illustration of self-sacrifice. But in him also we have the supreme illustration of self-appreciation. That is an extraordinary insight that made St. John connect the Master's act of washing the disciples' feet with his consciousness of divine dignity. How he knew what Jesus was thinking about just at that moment we know not. But he begins the story of the feet-washing by laying bare the mind of the Master. "Jesus, knowing that the Father had put all things into his hand, that he was come from God, and went to God, riseth from supper . . . and began to wash his disciples' feet."

The inspired artist draws two pictures for us to look upon at once: one of the upper room and the act of self-humiliation, the other of the soul of Jesus and his self-appreciation. In the act of serving his friends the Master was most conscious of himself. He knew himself to be no slave but the ruler of all. Though doing a slave's work he was no whit less a king. St. John clearly sees that for a slave to wash a guest's feet has no significance; but for a king—that is divine! It was the kingship of Jesus that gave importance to his act. A soul so rich, so calmly conscious of a self transcending the specific act of abnegation, so careful ever to preserve its isolation despite its thousand distracting intimacies—when such a soul stoops in service it communicates blessings vast and priceless.

Christ's self-giving saves the world not because it is just "giving," but because it was He that was given. If we study his portrait afresh we will discover that his self-reserve was quite as essential in his personality as his self-giving. He bound his disciples to him by what he did not tell them quite as much as by what he told them. They were his friends, but they worshiped him. Not one of them felt that he had plumbed the Master's soul.

It will be well for us if in following Christ we learn from him to be as well as to do. The secret of effectiveness in self-giving is not just in what is done, but in who does it. The being backs up the doing. It is of no less importance for the soul than for the financier to guard his capital. The personality must be kept intact. That is what carries life's business on. Self-investment is profitable in the degree in which the self has intrinsic value. The oil must be made to keep the lamp going—not distributed, through however amiable motives, to the poor. The best service we can render the weak is to be ourselves strong. The sick need our health and cheer more than medicine. The world is not so much in need of sympathy as of inspiration, the unconscious inspiration that our being noble and strong exercises upon others. There is often danger that our very sympathy shall make distress and illness a sort of luxury. But our strength, our character, our standing erect and meeting our own problems with courage, is contagious, and by having such a respect for our personality as Christ had for his, we help men as he helped them.

The pastor's best gift to his people is himself. Many pastors are like Martha, busy with too many things. They gossip and coax and plead and argue and sympathize. Their days are spent in small and cheap activities. They rob the mighty lantern of its flame by doling out the oil to the needy. But the needy need something other than these cheap doles. They need to see a man! They need to find in him a soul with depth enough to create in them respect for what is hidden from them. "In the every-day walk of life," says Ruskin, "the solitary thing we can ever distribute among those who walk by our side, be they joyful or sad, is the confidence, strength, the freedom and peace of our soul."

Mothers need to see this truth, for it is a mother's constant temptation to serve her children in lesser deeds that rob her self of its most important property, to forget herself and waste her soul in the routine demands made by her children. But let every mother know that the best way to serve her children is to keep alive in her breast the importance of her own personality. Let her know that the time will come when these little ones will need more than the services of her hands, more than the sacrifices of the nursery. Some day they will need her companionship. They will need her intelligence. They will need her to be large-minded, up-to-date, so that they may share their men's and women's problems with her. Happy is that mother who grows with her children! Happy she who keeps to herself in their childhood sacred hours for her own self-culture, renewing ever the oil in her lamp that to them her supreme gift may be a constant and increasing light!

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

A New Labor Organization

A new organization different from the ordinary labor union and different from socialist organizations, but borrowing something from each, is the organization called the Industrial Workers of the World. They are different from our labor unions in that the latter are guilds of skilled workmen for the most part, while the I. W. W. is composed for the most part of unskilled labor. The I. W. W. is working for a socialistic goal, but has no use for the political action method of reaching this goal.

The I. W. W. believes in what it calls "direct action." This does not mean dynamiting and criminal acts, as with the anarchists, but destructive practices such as the spoiling of work by the laborers and the promotion of industrial accidents which cannot be detected or come within the limits of the law. They believe in practicing strikes in order that the labor people may be trained for what they call "the general strike." In this general strike which is to outdo the French revolution in importance, the working men will starve their masters out and take possession of industry.

We know already of the activities of the I. W. W. among the strikers at Lawrence. The organization now has organizers from east to west. It has been especially effective among the track laborers of the Canadian Pacific. The organization was able to induce the men here to strike even though the road was paying the largest wages paid by any road for such service. They were able to interest every nationality, even Hindus, and Hindus are now taking the propaganda to India.

The movement is full of lessons for us. Unless we allow labor to organize under lawful forms, it will take the turn which we see in this movement. The I. W. W. is making serious invasions of the steel district, and we predict that the steel trust which crushed labor union organizations will now face something infinitely worse. The demand for economic justice takes on an ever more urgent note. We will have either progress, as in England, or revolution.

The Suicide of General Nogi

The whole civilized world was surprised and shocked to hear of the death by suicide of General Nogi and his wife of Japan. Since the Japanese War we have gotten into the habit of thinking of Japan as a modern and civilized nation. The death of this famous general serves to remind us again that the task of evangelization and civilization is not yet accomplished in Japan. Some newspapers have lauded the act of General Nogi as being commendable in the light of his faith and traditions. We must not be allowed to forget, however, that this cheap view of human life that would permit a man to sacrifice his life for the glory of the emperor is not a civilized nation. Many more decades of Christian teaching must yet be given to Japan before she will hold life sacred, as it is held everywhere in Christendom.

The Political Campaign

There are some things about this present campaign that are good. We are glad that there is such general business prosperity so that we may think clearly on our problems without any cheap appeal for a full dinner pail, or without any panics over impending financial reverses. The campaign is also a helpful one, in that much earnest thinking is being done. If the progressive movement shall do nothing more than this: that it compels considerations of a lot of big human issues, it will have justified itself. It will doubtless do more, however.

The campaign is not sounding a good note, however, in that so many personal slurs are being thrown against the different candidates. No cheap campaign of mud throwing will ever solve our problems. We can especially commend the campaigning of Dr. Wilson for the high levels upon which it moves. We could wish, in some cases, for a more frank handling of our problems, but we rejoice in the perfectly fair and dignified way in which he treats his opponents.

The political forecasters are already busy. Some very absurd estimates are being made as usual, by the partisans of the different parties. We will all know more about the results November 6.

Education in Sex Problems

The report of the committee on social purity of the Chicago Federation of Churches urges that the matter of sex education be given larger attention by both the home and the church. The committee recommends that classes be formed in the Sunday-school for the teaching of this subject, and a selected bibliography is presented indicating books that would be helpful for this purpose. It is further suggested that parents be encouraged to give more attention to this subject.

For several centuries the Anglo-Saxon world has helped maintain the "conspiracy of silence" with regard to human biology. This was first done through mistaken notions of modesty and virtue. It was thought that the road of ignorance was the road of purity. We know all too well that evil has its clandestine schools and that the policy of keeping a child in ignorance is an impossible policy. It is far more reverent to life and its processes to teach all legitimate knowledge in due season, as the developing mind of the child demands it, that virtue may be nourished by knowledge in place of ignorance.

The Christian physician has a great field in making himself a teacher of social purity. He will be able to speak with the voice of authority and dispel many a hoary fallacy which has helped to remove some of the legitimate terror from evil-doing. The Christian physician should be invited to meet classes in our churches, and he should delight to come, that the truth may be known by the young, not only about evil, but about all the great life processes.

Those parents who have already tried the new way of treating children with regard to these problems find certain marked results. In the first place, the children regard their own parents as truthful, that they do not give a fairy story in place of needed knowledge any more than a stone would be given for bread. The child reared in this way has a deeper respect for parenthood since he knows what it costs.

Virginia Brooks

There is no more striking figure about Chicago just now than that of Virginia Brooks. She is the Joan of Arc of a little community of five thousand at West Hammond, which is about twenty miles from the heart of Chicago. Her attention was first called to the conditions in this village when she received tax notices showing taxes levid on her proporties there which amounted to more than her land was worth. She then took up residence in the village and since three-fourts of the population is Polish, she learned that tongue in order to do the work which there was to do. Her efforts in the little town were a joke at first, but she gained control of the city government a year ago, and now a mayor is in power who is carrying out her ideas.

The reform movement in this city has uncovered conditions that were shocking. The traffic in women was carried on, on a large scale. Women and men were killed and secretly buried by the low element in the dives. Respect for law and order was a joke in the community.

Like all reform movements, the millenium was not ushered in with the election of a reform administration. Some city officials are charged with having sold out to the enemy. Suits are now in court to prove malfeasance in office on the part of some. Like all movements to cleanse a community, this one will have to go on for years before its work is finally complete.

Virginia Brooks has shown what woman can do without a ballot. No one is concerned, however, to use this as an argument against suffrage. It is such achievements as these that go far to remove what prejudice may exist in the minds of some with regard to the new woman movement. This woman has set some new standards for women in public service.

"Be it ours to meditate,
In these calm shades, thy milder majesty
And the beautiful order of thy works
Learn to conform the order of our lives.
My heart is awed within me when I think of the great miracle that still goes on,
In silence, 'round me—the perpetual work of thy creation, finished, yet renewed
Forever. Written on thy works I read
The lesson of thy own eternity."

The Gospel of Luke

When Luke wrote his gospel, there were in existence many narratives of the life of Jesus. These narratives were based on personal testimony. They had doubtless served well the disciples. But no one of them was entirely satisfactory to Luke. He felt that something more was needed and that he was called upon to supply the need. We may judge that he wrote a fuller and more carefully arranged account than any of those he had examined.

The method of Luke as a biographer deserves notice. He was not an eyewitness of the ministry of Jesus. He derived his facts, however, from the testimony of eyewitnesses. It was his aim not to write at the dictate of impulse but to set down the facts as he found them. He "traced the course of all things accurately from the first." The gospel to him was not a cunningly devised fable; it was the truth of God. Being the truth, it could bear the most painstaking scrutiny.

The beauty of the gospel of Luke has impressed itself upon many. In the perusal of this gospel Renan found the greatest charm; "For to the incomparable beauty of the foundation, common to all, he adds a degree of skill in composition which singularly augments the effect of the portrait, without seriously injuring its truthfulness." The reading of this story of Jesus ought to have saved certain of us from the error of thinking that whatever is attractive is sinful.

The charm of Luke is not that of the clever writer. His interest in fine phrases and in well told stories is secondary. His first concern is to give a portrait of Jesus of Nazareth. He wishes to have all men see Jesus and believe in him. He made attractive the one who spent his life in loving ministry to man. In an age when the great man was the soldier, Luke told the world of him who came not to seek the wealth and the glory of the world but to seek men and to save them from their evil ways.

The universality of the gospel receives emphasis in the writings of Luke. The ministry of the apostles was to begin at Jerusalem but it was to extend unto all the nations. The right of the Jew to share in the benefits of the Christian salvation was recognized; the Savior whom Luke saw was for all mankind. "Points in our Lord's teaching which have no interest for Gentile readers are altogether passed over or curtailed. Thus the teaching, in the Sermon on the Mount, as to the relation of the new to the old law is omitted; so also is the denunciation of the Jews for observing the 'tradition' at the expense of the law (Mt. 15: 1; Mk. 7: 1) the rebuke of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt. 23:1) is greatly shortened. The frequent allusions to the universality of the Gospel are to be explained by the same reference to gentile readers. St. Luke alone quotes in full (3: 5, 6) the prophecy of Is. 40:3—'All flesh shall see the salvation of God'—a prophecy which all the evangelists connect with John the Baptist. Our Lord's first recorded teaching (4:24) emphasizes the admission of the Gentiles to privileges at the hands of Elijah and Elisha, while his last explanation of Scriptures at Emmaus (24: 47) showed that 'repentance and forgiveness of sins were to be preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.'"

In Luke appear the stories of the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son. These illustrate what Jesus meant when he bade his disciples observe the law of love. To overcome race antipathies and to restore the sinful to a rightful place in the Father's house are duties of love that make heavy demands upon the present generation. We have as neighbors men of many races and degrees of enlightenment. Their customs are, many of them, strange to us. The stronger races are getting territory that we intended to own. The weaker peoples offer opportunity for our greed and we make money by degrading them. The drunkard, the strange woman, and the common thief are blots on the pages of our history and a constant trouble to us. We have too often made our laws merely to get these offenders out of the way, to render them less bothersome to us, and have thought too little of what we might do for them. We have not believed that we could cure these ancient evils. The man of the world has been allowed to tell us what can and what cannot be done. The love that was in Christ has been crowded out. It has had no part in forming our faith respecting the cure of sin. We read Luke and the other gospels with a bias that keeps the truth from us. Let us read that we may know the power of redeeming love, and that we may get our faith from the Son of man. [Midweek Service, Oct. 2.] S. J.

The Cheapening of Worship

The Christian Register (Unitarian) has an excellent editorial on the above subject. Perhaps it appealed to this writer strongly because of his own recent experiences which led him to conclude that worship was fast becoming almost a lost art. In one service he found that chaos and bedlam reigned until the first hymn was announced, and even then quiet was not restored for several minutes. The minister himself seemed to be in a hurry to get through the service, as the day was hot, and evidently added to the general discomfort by his haste. Solemnity there was none, all seemed jaded and unresponsive. The sermon was below par a long way, evidently a product of Saturday night, hastily put together, but containing neither instruction nor inspiration. All seemed pleased when the benediction was pronounced.

For our part we left the building convinced that the people are to be congratulated upon their fidelity to the church services, if the one we attended was a sample of what goes on regularly. It is really a question whether we need more ministers or more minister, if we may borrow a trite saying. The quality we believe much more than quantity will go far to solve the problem of ministerial supply. And above all else just now is needed a course in training for worship. While the duties of the eldership are being set forth, would it not be a good thing if some one would write a book on the duties of the minister with reference to the church service? It is important to build up a great congregation but to that end we know of nothing more desirable than the ability to create a religious atmosphere. So we appreciate the following from our esteemed contemporary:

A large and sumptuously furnished church, a congregation of nearly a thousand persons, a distinguished vacation preacher sprawled in a chair on the side of a high platform; a pulpit shaped like a music-stand, chiefly used in order that the minister may stand safely on one leg; above, a high loft for the singers; and, still higher, the most glorified object that met the eye, the agile organist—this is what the devout worshipper saw as he entered a leading church in one of our large cities. The pews, a few stained-glass windows, and the organ alone conveyed any suggestion of a church. The decorations had not the remotest relation to the purpose of the room, and the atmosphere of worship came entirely from the quiet throng of men and women who joined in the responses and the hymns. Not so much of the bearing of reverence did the minister himself bring. No live coal from the altar had touched his lips. The prayer, spoken while the people were standing, had no accent of awe, no sense of the Infinite Presence. It was strangely short, appearing to be mere deference to the propriety of the occasion, and consisted of a catalogue of subjects to which the attention of the Creator was directed, in which no general human need intruded.

If this were an unusual thing, it would be ungracious to expose it; but it is a sign of a tendency in contemporary religion. It indicates the substitution of the speaker for the religious minister, the audience room for the church, and the displacement of spirituality by ordinariness. The cheapening of public worship, the attenuation of solemnity and piety to the vanishing point, the reliance upon attractions out of keeping with human reverence, lower church ministrations in modern estimation. The tendency is manifest in all branches of Protestantism to-day. Sunday, becoming like any other day outside the churches, is less and less distinguishable from other days inside the churches. Reverence cannot be supposed to be dying out in human nature, but the neglect of it, the affronts to it, where most it should be nurtured, is a symptom of dangerous import. If dignity and sacredness are not preserved in the churches, who can say that secularism is to be blamed for their waning influence? If in any of them such a marring of impressiveness is overlooked and tolerated, who can charge the man outside the church with insensibility?

Evangelists Criticise Their Craft

A conference of evangelists representing many denominations was held last week at the Moody Institute in Chicago. The discussion that took place there bears out the observation repeatedly made by The Christian Century that the severest critics of modern evangelism are the evangelists themselves. The evils and illusions of revivalism were laid bare at this conference. Plain speech was the order of all the sessions. It was said straight out that saving souls had degenerated into a tricky trade in the United States, and evangelists were accused of adopting the devices of the fakir and the fly-by-night promoter by members of their own profession. Among the practices mentioned and condemned were:

Boosting "free will" offerings in auctioneer's fashion.
Posing for pictures in imitation of vaudeville artists.
Lying about the number of conversions made.
Using "slang" promiscuously.
Breaking chairs on the pulpit to get an effect.
Acting a part in a melodramatic story.
Attacking higher criticism without warrant.

Dr. W. E. Biederwolf of Monticello, Ind., asserted some plan could be found by which evangelists could earn a stated salary instead of depending on "free will" offerings, which might be too small or entirely too large, depending on the evangelist's skill in "getting the money." He condemned the practice of posing for pictures, and said he felt ashamed of himself every time he saw some of the pictures of himself he had posed for before he realized his mistake

Dr. F. E. Taylor, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis, Ind., a former evangelist, told how he was disillusioned: "When I started out as an evangelist another evangelist invited me to come to his house and learn, as he said, the tricks of the trade. 'I have got 'em skinned a mile in taking an offerin',' he said, I was indignant. Imagine a Wesley, Whitefield or a Moody saying this! When they gave Mr. Moody a free will offering of from $2,000 to $3,000 for several months' work in London, he handed back one-half of the amount. He said it was too much. Some evangelists exaggerate results in reporting the number of conversions to such an extent that it is nothing less than bare-faced lying. I have sat in the pulpit and counted when evangelists have named the number of persons asking prayer, and I know they named several times more than the facts warranted. I saw 3,000 men rise in a meeting on the invitation of an evangelist who asked all that wanted to be better to rise, and then he reported that 3,000 men had sought God."

Dr. Taylor criticised evangelists who try to get cheap applause by denouncing higher criticism of which they themselves are ignorant. "Evangelists are in danger of becoming artificial," he said, "because they do not keep up with the times in their reading. It is easy to get applause at any time by denouncing higher criticism. When you get the evangelist down in a corner he does not know what higher criticism is and how it differs from lower criticism. I am more afraid of lower criticism than of higher criticism. Insincerity in story telling is another serious evil. I know a prominent evangelist who tells a story as if he was the actor in it, when I know that the story was told him and he was not near the event when it happened."

These are but a few of the drastic utterances of the conference. Such free and vigorous condemnation of the evils of evangelism would be more reassuring to those who have at heart the well-being of the Church of Christ if there were any signs that the critics recognize the more fundamental flaw in the system itself. The condemnation due to modern revivalism must not be confined to specific devices or eccentricities or abuses which figure in the methods of certain revivalists, but to the dominant principle upon which the entire system rests.

The hypnotic principle which underlies most professional revivalistic procedure, even of the more respectable type, is incompatible with the pedagogical method of Jesus. As in so many other things, our Christian Master anticipated in this point also the findings of modern psychology. Modern psychology shows us that the use of the hypnotic principle belongs to the more primitive stage of society, and that through it very little real progress in the social order is made, though there may be much apparent progress.

Over against this primitive hypnotic principle, science and Jesus place the principle of education, the development of insight and habit, as the true method of progress.

It will be a great day for the Kingdom of God when the Church is thoroughly and intelligently disillusionized as to the possibility of all short-cut methods and settles down to her essential task of religious education.

Parcels Post on January 1.

Postmaster-General Hitchcock expects to put the new general parcels post into operation by Jan. 1. Thousands of people all over the country will be sorry it will not be ready in time for the sending of Christmas packages this year. The post-office department, however, is bending every energy to put the system in operation as soon as possible, but to make arrangements for such a flood of package mail right at the outset as the Christmas season would precipitate is more than can be arranged for in so short a time. As it is, the postmaster-general has cancelled his plans for summer vacation, and will devote the time to organizing the new service. A committee will investigate the methods employed by express companies, and the experience gained by them in handling parcels will be utilized by the post-office as far as possible. This commission will also make estimates of the number of new horses and wagons, clerks and equipment which will be required by the new service. It is true the carriage of parcels will not be entirely new to the post-office. For years it has been possible to send smaller packages of fourth class matter, as well as packages of approximately the size provided for in the new department to foreign countries, or to receive such parcels by mail from foreign ports. But between points in the United States the express companies have enjoyed a monopoly in the carriage of large parcels. The new parcels service is not intended to put the express companies out of business, but rather to break the monopoly by which they have held up express rates to excessive amounts. The express companies will continue to do all heavy express carriage, but parcels under eleven pounds will largely be sent by mail. The turning of this immense flood of mail into the post-office at one stroke is a tremendous undertaking. An army of clerks, in addition to those now employed, will be required. Probably thousands of new mail cars to carry the additional mail will be called for, and the facilities for delivering mail, both in the city and the rural routes, must be greatly increased. But the new equipment will be in the nature of additions to the present facilities, and will not be operated separately. Following its introduction it is freely predicted that many post-office buildings will be found too small or so inconveniently arranged that new quarters seem imperative, and that is another problem which the department will face later. The initial expense will be large, but increased benefit will more than justify it. With the addition of the parcels post, our post-office is assuming its former place among the most progressive of such departments. The revenue which will surely come from this new department of the postal service ought to put a stop to the proposed additional tax upon the people by increasing the rate now charged for postage upon newspapers.

—Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor-emeritus of the Christian Evangelist, avoiding party terms and personalities, is nevertheless saying some vigorous things for the Progressive party in his always interesting Easy Chair department. Dr. Garrison, it is now known, was invited by the committee to offer the opening prayer at the Progressive convention which nominated Theodore Roosevelt for President. Through delay in receiving the letter he was unable to officiate.

—More than $120,000,000 was obtained from the American public through the use of the mails to defraud by the 1,063 offenders arrested by the federal authorities in the fiscal year ending June 30, besides the incalculable amount obtained by those not apprehended. The frauds included bogus mining ventures, fake medicinal decoctions and worthless land deals. Of the offenders arrested, some of them millionaires, 452 have been convicted.

The Enrichment of the Church Life

The Culture of Prayer and of Praise

Edgar DeWitt Jones

That the life of the average church is in need of enrichment is so obvious that no parade of evidences is necessary. Especially is this true of all non-liturgical churches. From a heavily encrusted and historically elaborated litany the pendulum has swung far out toward naked crudity and frigid simplicity. Today there are signs that lead us to believe that the pendulum is slowly swinging back and we could wish that the stopping place would be midway between the two extremes.

It is not possible nor even desirable that our churches have a fixed order of service, but it is altogether desirable that we enrich our service devotionally, that we cultivate reverence and make our meeting houses wholesomely sweet with the perfume of worship and praise. The New Testament does not prescribe any form of worship. We are free to use whatever may be wise and helpful, only let us use this freedom profitably. Robert Browning, perhaps from the memory of his boyhood in York Street Chapel, London, has thus expressed the value of free worship.

"I, then, in ignorance and weakness,
Taking God's help have attained to think
My heart does best to receive in meekness,
That mode of worship as most to his mind,
Where earthly aids being cast behind,
His all appears serene,
With the thinnest human veil between,
Letting the mystic lamps the seven,
The many motions of the spirit,
Pass, as they list, from earth to heaven.

The Culture of Prayer.

First in the order of this enrichment is the culture of prayer. According to the Scriptures, the temple of God is the "house of prayer." Calvin went so far as to affirm that "God declares that prayer is the chief part of His service." This may be an exaggeration but every discerning soul knows that prayer rightfully understood is nine-tenths of the Christian life. Indeed this word prayer so often on our tongue means vastly more than petition or supplication or even articulate speech. The twelve words from the Hebrew of the Old Testament and the Greek of the New Testament, which we translate by the single English word "prayer" means also "communion," "worship," "outpouring of self," "adoration," and "praise." Prayerfulness on the part of all the worshippers as well as on the part of the ministers, the attitude of communion with God, reverent and receptive, means such enrichment as only those who have felt God by the feelings of faith, can know.

A flippant, gossipy gathering together of church people, is a travesty and a caricature of a church of Christ.

Mr. Gladstone's Habit.

Mr. Gladstone used always when the weather would permit to walk alone the mile from Hawarden Castle to the chapel where he worshipped, because, as he expressed it, he wished to prepare himself for reverent taking part in the service of God's house. The grand old man held that conversation at such a time was distracting. "Be still and know that I am God," is a good text for a congregation of worshippers to bear in mind.

The late Arthur T. Pierson once said that if he were to build a church he would have it constructed with as many exits as the Mormon Temple, and that he would say to his congregation, (I quote from memory the substance of what he said): "If you must visit after the benediction, I beg of you to go out of doors as quickly as you can, and do not turn this place into a hotel lobby." I am not endorsing this entirely; indeed, I think it is too strongly put. I am only seeking to show how great souls feel the urgent need of cultivating the devotional spirit in the house of God.

The Preacher's Part.

The preacher's part in cultivating prayerfulness and enriching generally the church life is, of course, paramount. To him is given the golden key that will unlock the flood gates of power, and upon the strong, full tide of prayer to carry the hearts of his people to the very throne of grace and truth.

Many ministers undervalue public prayer. Some of us who always prepare carefully our sermons, seldom or never prepare prayers. We trust to the inspiration of the hour to supply the devotional quality and to our fluency to provide the phraseology. There are a few men so marvelously gifted in public prayer as to warrant such lack of preparation but the average preacher who follows such a course does so at a perilous price. If a minister cannot write out both the Sunday morning sermon and prayer, would it not often be best to write out the morning prayer? I do not mean, of course, that he should always memorize what he has written and repeat it verbatim; but that such a course will greatly increase his power in public prayer I verily believe. Would it not be a further gain in behalf of the enrichment of our services if the minister occasionally used a prayer prepared by gifted and reverent minds of his own or other communions?

Use of Prepared Prayers.

For example the Joint Committee of the Protestant Episcopal Church on Christian Unity has sent out a statement, a copy of which I take it all of the ministers of our communion have received. The statement embodies three prayers, and the committee suggests that on the first Sunday in each month the prayers be used in all Episcopal churches and expresses the hope that other communions will also be glad to use them. The prayers sent out by the Joint Commission are noble in phraseology, lofty in thought and reverential throughout. Would it not be profitable for many of our ministers to make just such use of these prayers as the Commissions suggest? I think it would.

My brethren, let us cultivate prayerfulness in the churches to which we minister. Let us study how best to lead our communicants to the throne of the Heavenly Father and leave them there for increase of power. To do this we must ourselves be prayerful men living close to God and seeking to love like Christ. For

"He prayeth best who loveth best,
All things both great and small."

The Ministry of Sacred Music.

The second item in the enrichment of our church service is that of sacred music. Here indeed is a great aid to faith. No Christian communion except the Friends have failed to use sacred song and, according to Prof. Hoyt, the Friends are now beginning its use. Says Dr. Hickman, "There never was any land so barbarous or any people so polite but have always approached their gods with the solemnity of music and expressed their devotion with a song."

How dear to our hearts are the hymns of our faith. It has been my privilege to hear some of the truly great singers of the world in the productions of illustrious composers but I have never heard any singing that has lifted me up so grandly and melted my heart more completely than when two years ago in Paris, France, six thousand miles away from native land and dear ones, I heard in a Christian home two young American students of De Rezke, who were also followers of Christ, sing with great beauty and tenderness:

'Abide with me, fast falls the eventide,
The darkness deepens, Lord with me abide!
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee
Help of the helpless, Oh, abide with me.'.

Vocal Music in Worship.

Vocal music in public worship has a two-fold function, that of expression and impression. Hymns of expression are the most helpful, voicing as they do the feelings of adoration, penitence, thanksgiving and trust. The function of impression in church music is a minor one, that of impressing and stirring the emotions. As a matter of fact, we sing too many hymns written in a minor key. We sing too many mournful melodies instead of the great, buoyant, robust, virile hymns of jubilant hope and triumphant trust. "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt," is a beatiful poem and the music by Von Weber is exquisitely tender, but it is not a hymn for every Sunday use. The same is true of "I Would Not Live Alway, I Ask Not to Stay," of "They are Gathering Homeward One by One," and many other hymns that are very appropriate for certain times and places, but not at all suitable for constant use. The revisers of our hymnals have wrought well, but there is still much for them to do in the way of eliminating sickly, sentimental hymns along with others that teach a theology that belongs to the dark ages. It may further be remarked in passing that had revisions of hymn books begun seriously twenty-five years sooner, perhaps the iconolastic work of the Christian Scientist revisers need not have occurred.

Congregational Singing.

If church music is to fulfill its mission in spiritual enrichment, it should, of course, be congregational. No other music is so worshipful, so praiseful, so inspiring, and I may add, no other music is now so rare. Visitors to Plymouth Church in great Beecher's day, were attracted there by the superb full-voiced congregational singing almost as strongly as by the illuminating sermons they were sure to hear. Those who attended the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, will never forget the singing when without organ or piano the great throng sang with unction, such stately worshipful hymns as: "The Church's One Foundation is Jesus Christ, Her Lord." Quartettes and solos are helpful but, at their best, they are poor substitutes for chorus choirs or singing by all the people. Such singing partakes more or less of the nature of a performance. In that truly important article, "Should Smith Go to Church," by Meredith Nicholson, in the June Atlantic, that popular author has this pungent paragraph.

"The presence behind the pulpit of a languid quartette praising God on behalf of the bored sinners in the pews has always seemed to me the profanest of anomalies. Nor has long contemplation of vested choirs in Episcopal churches shaken my belief that church music should be an affair of the congregation."

Common Sense in Criticism.

Not every quartette is "languid" nor all congregations thus sung to "bored," but there is too much common sense in Mr. Nicholson's criticism to laugh it lightly out of court. It is heresy of a serious sort, when the minister proudly professes that he has "nothing to do with the music of his church." And why not? As logically confess he has nothing to do with Sunday-school, the prayer-meeting or the finances. The music of the church is part of the preacher's task. To make it more spiritual, to have a part in selecting suitable hymns, and to develop congregational singing, all this is at once his task and his very great privilege. There is scarcely a strong congregation in the land but that could profitably employ a chorister to train the profitably employ a chorister to train the people to sing and to form a chorus choir. There is not a church anywhere but needs to enrich worshipfully its singing.

The ministry of sacred song is mighty and the blessed result of such worship is majestically set forth by seer-like John Milton in Il Penseroso.

"There let the pealing organ blow
To the full voiced choir below,
In service high and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstacies,
And bring all heaven before my eyes."

In the stressing of these two great aids to the spiritual enrichment of the church service, the culture of the ministry of prayer and sacred song, I am assuming the daily striving for Godlikeness on the part of the individual disciple, of right living and high thinking, of the employment of Christian ethics in business and high ideals in the home. If one so endeavors to live and love every day, then on Sunday when he goes up to the house of the Lord his "Mind and heart, according well,

May make one music as before,
But vaster."

Forgiving Sin

It Costs—It Redeems—It Is Power

By Professor James Denney

In The British Weekly.

It is not only a fact that human beings forgive each other; it is a fact that genuine human forgiveness is bestowed at a great cost. When we are won by it, as it is exhibited by father or mother, by wife or husband, by brother or sister or friend, we can say: I was bought with a price. There is no such experience in the relations of human beings as a real forgiveness which is painless, cheap, or easy. There is always passion in it on both sides; the passion of penitence on the one side, and the more profound and moving passion of love on the other, bearing the sin of the guilty to win him through reconciliation to goodness again. This fact—for it is a fact—goes to the heart of the Christian truth about pardon. What all doctrines of atonement guard and are intended to display, is the cost of forgiveness to God. Why should we question that there is cost? It is the good who feel evil deeply, and have the sternest resentment of wrong; it is their love which passes through an agony as it wrestles with the problems the wrong has created, and while bearing the strain of them unrelieved, is able to win again the heart of the offender.

It Reconciles.

This is the only kind of love which has any suggestion in it of the reconciling, sin-forgiving love of God; and again, we may argue from it on our Lord's principle as from the less to the greater. If ye being evil, are willing to pay such a price to renew the relations wrong has broken, how much more will your heavenly Father be at cost to reconcile his offending children to himself? How dearly bought must that great forgiveness be which is the highest achievement of a love that has borne the sin of the whole world! What is suggested to us by such a line of thought is clearly revealed in the cross. God's forgiveness, like all the real forgiveness we know, comes through an agony and a passion; and at Gethsemane and Calvary, our hearts open to this truth. The difficulties which have been felt in some doctrines of atonement—perhaps we should say which have been made by them—are due to contrasting Christ with God in his atoning work, instead of recognizing that he is God's representative there. It is the Father who sends him. It is the work of the Father he is doing. It is the Father he is revealing, in particular.

Can Never Fathom.

He is bringing home to our hearts what our own experience of forgiving surely makes only too credible, that the forgiveness of God rises up through the depths of a passion that the sinful can never fathom. It is not easier or cheaper than our forgiveness. It is not alien to it, so that neither could help us to understand the other. It is akin to it; but in cost, as in value, it rises above it as heaven is higher than the earth. Why should we quarrel with the atonement which in revealing the cost of forgiveness to God, stamps that forgiveness as genuine, and brings it into relation with all that deserves to be called forgiveness among ourselves?

Powerful Motive.

There is another fact connected with human forgiveness which provides the key to some of the most paradoxical statements about the Christian life in the New Testament. Even when it is only one human being who forgives another, forgiveness is the most powerful of all motives to a new mode of behavior. Nothing in point of fact strikes so deep into the human heart, evokes penitence so tender and unreserved, carries with it such joy and such sorrow—in a word, such inspiring and regenerating power. Forgiveness not only restores the old relation which wrong had dissolved; it gives the offender a new and more tender sense of what is due to it, a loyalty to its obligations unknown before. Until forgiveness revealed the love which his wrong-doing had wounded, he was hardly conscious it was there; now he can hardly be conscious of anything else. It is not a legal obligation which binds him. He is upon his honor now, and it would be a disloyalty worse than any legal transgression if he wounded such love again. It has taken through forgiveness a security for his future goodness with which nothing in the world can be compared.

Voices of Old.

Even in Old Testament times, and under a legal dispensation, there were evangelical voices which could sing, There is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared. It is God's pardoning love which secures, and is intended to secure, man's reverence for him. He is feared—that is, in the proper Old Testament sense; he is the object of religious adoration—not because he imposes laws upon men, but because he forgives and redeems. The consciousness of pardon is a far more potent thing than any consciousness of law for producing good men. This is the key to all that is paradoxical, and at the same time to all that is characteristic and profound, in St. Paul's gospel. What the law could not do, forgiveness does; it creates the new heart, and with it the new holiness. It is not anything statutory which makes saints out of sinful men; it is the forgiveness which comes through the passion of Jesus. That is in strict agreement with the analogy of human pardon; nothing works such deep and far-reaching transformations in character. The child whom his father or mother forgives through pain cannot but be good while the sense of this forgiveness rests upon his heart; and it is this simple principle, or rather this simple fact, on which the gospel rests. God trusts to the sense of forgiveness to produce in men the righteousness which law could not produce.

Paul's Principle.

It is amazing to see New Testament scholars accuse Paul of incoherence, and find in his writings, or even in a single closely knit epistle like Romans, two different gospels unrelated to each other, the one meant to explain forgiveness, the other to secure holiness. Paul has only one gospel, the gospel of forgiveness; but he knew that in God's forgiveness, as in man's, lies the deepest secret of moral power. It would have seemed incredible to him, as it may well seem to anyone who argues on the basis of human experience, that forgiveness should ever be thought of as if it were self-contained or morally impotent. It is a truth which we can verify in common human relations every day, that forgiveness regenerates, and it is this simple truth which gives unity both to the mind and the gospel of St. Paul. Forgiveness regenerates, and nothing else does: even among sinful men this is so.

O, let us sing, my comrades,
Of blessings by the way——
Each cloud's a silver lining,
There's blue beyond the gray;
Ah, as we sing about it
The shadows break apart,
And all the world's in sunshine
Because we're light of heart.

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS."

CHAPTER XVI.

"Now that we are here," said Van Shaw, "I simply want to repeat what I said. You don't butt into my affairs. Keep out. Coleman overheard a part of what you told Mrs. Douglas to-day while you were near the cemetery rock. He was on the other side of it. What you said may be true, but I consider it a sneaking thing and I won't stand for it."

Bauer was still. In the first place he had never faced such a situation and in the darkness there he swiftly recurred to his talk with Mrs. Douglas. He had found her already prepared for a part of what he had to say. Esther, sensitively intelligent in anything relating to Helen's welfare, had not seen Van Shaw a moment before she felt a repulsion for him amounting to horror. What Bauer told her from his own knowledge of Van Shaw's immoral life in Burrton roused all her mother instincts to protect her child from a fate worse than death if she should marry a man who had already fallen. She shared in the fullest degree with Bauer's deep fear that Helen might, in her desire for the soft and beautiful things of wealth, risk her very life itself, not because she knew she was doing it, but partly through ignorance of the real character of the man who had the unblushing selfishness to ask a pure girl like Helen to accept him as a husband, knowing himself to be what he was.

And Bauer, measuring in his slow but not stupid fashion all the consequences of his action in warning Mrs. Douglas, knowing clearly the code of morals governing men like Van Shaw and the wicked and unchristian standard of even so-called Christian society in condemning what it called "telling on others," nevertheless went forward to do what seemed to him to be only necessary in the name of common honor and decency.

The fact that Van Shaw had found out what he had done did not disturb him greatly. The only thing that troubled him now was to hold himself sufficently in hand. He had never hated anyone in his life except this rich man's son and he had been slow to entertain that feeling for him. But it had grown like a tropical plant within the last three days. And all the old Teutonic rage latent in him was at the boiling point whenever he thought of Van Shaw and Helen together. He said to himself there in the darkness that if there had been light enough to see Van Shaw's sneering face he would have struck it. He remembered hearing his own father say once that one of his ancestors at Lausbrencken had choked the life out of a family enemy, using only one hand around the man's throat. He was so afraid of himself now that he involuntarily stepped back away from Van Shaw and Van Shaw noted it and put the action down to cowardice or fear.

"Well, are you going to keep out of my affairs? Is it any business of yours whether I try to make friends with the Douglases? Or perhaps—" he suddenly changed his tone as if a new thought had broken in on his mind. "Look here, Bauer. Perhaps—well, maybe you don't understand— I am going to marry Miss Douglas!"

"What!" Bauer cried out. He stepped nearer Van Shaw and Van Shaw stepped back, nearer the edge of the rock.

"Well," Van Shaw laughed. "That is, as soon as she says yes, I am. My intentions are all right. But—" and his accustomed mood quickly reasserted itself, "I warn you to keep out. Leave my affairs alone. A fellow whose father and mother have done what yours have, isn't in the best position to throw stones at other people."

Felix Bauer long afterwards confessed to the dearest friend he had, that in that moment he had the nearest approach to the thought of murder and hate he ever knew. But before he could reply to Van Shaw's brutality he saw him stagger and reel and throw up his arms on the edge of the rock. He heard him cry out, "For God's sake, Bauer!" and then he fell backward and disappeared over the cliff.

For a second Bauer stood in his place smitten with horror. He was totally ignorant of the character of the ground where Van Shaw had been standing and of what lay below. Evidently a shelving piece of the rotten sandstone had broken off. How much of the edge was dangerous it was impossible to tell there in the dark.

He uttered one loud cry of "Help!" and then flung himself down full length and dragged himself to the place where Van Shaw had disappeared.

Just as he reached the edge, he heard fragments of the rock go rattling down and a sound as of a heavy body falling somewhere. He peered over fearfully. He shouted again. He looked, straining down, and it seemed to him that about twenty feet below he could see a huddled-up body lying on a projecting ledge.

And then Felix Bauer did as brave or as foolhardy a thing as anyone ever did. It was partly to punish himself for the murderous feeling he had entertained a moment before that he now said, "Good God! I must save him now. Help me, God! Help me!"

He swung about on the edge of the ragged rock and let his feet down. He felt a projecting knob of something, and then for a sickening second he paused and shouted again and then he let go, hugging the face of the cliff. As he went down, he began to realize thankfully that the cliff was rough and irregular. His hands were running blood, but he did not know it. As he felt resting places for his feet, or anything for his hands to clutch, he sobbed, "God help me! God help me!"

He was down at last near enough to see that Van Shaw had fallen in a bent-over position on a shelf of rock, a little more than wide enough to hold his body. He called to him but received no answer. At last he was near enough to drop down on the ledge but as he was about to do so, Van Shaw, with a groan of pain, turned over, and began to roll towards the edge.

Bauer desperately let go of everything, fell in a lump and snatched at Van Shaw. He caught one arm and, panting, held onto it. The rest of Van Shaw's body was hanging over the side of the ledge, and even in that critical moment Bauer recalled his first view of Oraibi rock as the wagons had come up from the Oraibi Wash and the Tolchaco party had scanned through the field-glass the inaccessible sides. But he was on the opposite side now and how far it was below the place where he now was he could not tell. Only he knew it must be a killing distance down there in the dark that seemed to be reaching up black, heavy hands pulling at Van Shaw's unconscious body, pulling at it harder and harder every second. He could feel himself slipping down across the smooth ledge which offered no place for his sliding feet. He was using his last strength, but every second it seemed impossible. His lungs were bursting. The red taste of hot blood was in his mouth; he had a confused thought that he could let go of Van Shaw's arm any time, but he did not let go. He was slipping, slipping down, pulled inch by inch by those strong black hands of the dark down there, but still he clung and sobbed, "God, save us!"

And then Elijah Clifford's voice called to him.

"I'm coming, Bauer, I'm coming."

The voice gave Felix one more ounce of strength. He exerted it, was conscious that someone was down there with him farther off at the side of the ledge, then his hold loosened, everything turned black and he did not know any more.

When he came to himself he was lying on one of the seats of the little chapel. Anxious, white, frightened faces were all about him. He was dimly aware of Mr. and Mrs. Douglas and Mr. and Mrs. Masters and Elijah Clifford and Miss Gray and Helen and a group of tourists, one of whom he heard Mr. Douglas call "doctor." He seemed to feel conscious of another body that was lying on a bench near him, the body of Van Shaw, and as it stirred and groaned, he had an undefined feeling of thankfulness that he was still alive and that no murder had been committed. And then the hot taste of blood came into his mouth and he knew his hemorrhage had come on again.

He was too weak to talk and felt irritated at the hubbub about him. But cots were soon provided and he and Van Shaw and Helen were carried down the trail to their tents, where a curious and interested group soon gathered. Van Shaw had broken his shoulder and one leg. The doctor was not certain about other and internal injuries. But Van Shaw was conscious and unless something unforeseen took place, he was in a fair way to recover.

Everyone was excited and sleep was out of the question. So when everything possible had been done for Bauer and Van Shaw, Elijah Clifford told what he knew of the accident and in his own way related his share in the evening's adventures.

"You see, I had just lighted our lantern and had stepped out of the chapel to light our folks down the trail when I heard Bauer's cry for help. I hadn't seen him go out and I didn't know what he was doing out there, but it's always been a rule of the Mission when any one yells 'help,' to run in that direction. I fell over an old standard oil can and broke my lantern and my shins. And I guess while I was down, Bauer was just getting over the edge of the rock.

"Say! Talk about recklessness, I take it Herr Felix Bauer has us all beat a-run-down-the-trail-and-back. You strangers from New York, how would you like to back off the top of the Flat Iron Building, hang onto the coping with your fingers for a second and then let go, trusting to strike a window ledge or something between the soles of your shoes and Madison Square? Well, that's just what this tuberculosis son of Germany did, and if it doesn't knock all the snake traditions of this old rock into piki bread crumbs then I have lost my way and forgotten where I started from."

"How about yourself?" asked one of the New York tourists. "Didn't you go down the same place?"

In the light of the camp fire it was not easy to see that Elijah Clifford actually blushed. But he did, and Miss Gray sat near enough to note it. If Elijah Clifford had not been so embarrassed by the New York man's question he might possibly, if he had been looking in Miss Gray's direction, have seen a new face on her face. A look of shy admiration that belongs to the borderland of another country called affection, which is a nearby statue to another called love. But Clifford hastened to say:

"Oh, I had a light to go down with. When I fell I broke the glass, but lucky the light did not go out, so I could see where I was going. And when I got down, there was Bauer hanging on to Van Shaw's arm in the most affectionate manner, as if he didn't want to have him leave before his visit was over. I hadn't more than time to get my foot braced on the lantern or something, when Bauer turned his friend over to me and for a minute or two he was on my hands, but by that time the folks up on top had let down some ropes and we soon got everybody up all right."

"Elijah," said Mr. Masters reproachfully, "why don't you go into the details? You know that when Mr. Douglas and I climbed down on the ropes, you were almost over the edge with Van Shaw's body."

"Well, that's the most slippery piece of rock I ever felt," said Clifford, and again he failed to note a movement on the part of Miss Gray. When Masters had said that Clifford had almost gone over the edge of the ledge with Van Shaw's body, she had put out the hand nearest Clifford, as if to hold him back.

"Yes," said Clifford, "that ledge is smooth and no mistake. If any more folks are going to fall over onto it, I think the commissioners in Oraibi ought to drive some nails into it, or else build a neat little concrete wall around it. There were times while I was down there thinking it over, that I would have given considerable for a good, high English garden wall on the other side of Van Shaw's body and me. A lantern is a poor thing to brace your feet on. It lacks staying powers."

"Gentlemen," said Masters, turning to the group around the fire, "we have had a most wonderful deliverance from a tragedy and it is due to the heroism of two of the bravest men that ever lived. Elijah, don't interrupt me. The only way we can express our thanks is to go to the Heavenly Father with them," and without a moment's pause as if it were the most natural thing in the world, as it was with him, Masters broke into a prayer of thanksgiving so tender and eloquent that Helen, whose cot had been placed in one of the tents with its front opening near the fire where she could hear everything, bent her head over on her arms and cried.

She had been under a great nervous tension all day. And this last scene, coming as a most astonishing climax to it all, affected her quick imagination. Another thing had added to all the rest, at the memory of which she blushed as she hid her face in her hands during the quiet that followed that prayer by Masters.

When the three cots, her own, Bauer's and Van Shaw's, had been brought down the trail, at one place in a turn of the passage, while the bearers had to set the cots down to make some changes in the way of carrying them, her cot had stood a moment by the side of Van Shaw's. And in that moment, in the pale darkness, softened by the light of two or three lanterns, she had felt her hand seized. She almost screamed. It was Van Shaw's hand that had reached out from his blanket and for a moment he had almost crushed her fingers. She was not certain even now that he had known what he was doing, or that it was more than a convulsive movement in his semi-conscious condition. But the memory of it burned her cheeks like fire, and long after the last embers of the camp fire had died into grey ashes, she lay there in the tent wide awake and sleepless.

After a while she grew aware that her mother was sitting close by her. Esther had determined, after what she had heard from Bauer, to have a talk with Helen at the first opportunity. The accident to Van Shaw had changed her purpose somewhat, but she said to herself it had not changed the facts in the case of Van Shaw's character, and the matter was still in the same condition as before the accident happened. With that in mind, mother and daughter began to talk together almost in a whisper, mindful of the thin tent walls and the nearness of the other members of the party. Their precaution was, however, almost needless, for everyone in both camps was sound asleep, and Van Shaw's own wagon and tent were at the farthest bounds of the camp, removed from the rest so he would not be disturbed.

"I can't sleep, mother, it has been such an exciting day. Was there ever such a day in my life? And I think this last thing has shaken me. I never knew before what it meant to have nerves. But I can't shut out the picture of that snake dance and that terrible cliff and——"

She hesitated and then feeling her mother's hand enfolding hers, she said, with the frankness that had always been true of her confidences with her mother.

"There is another thing that has made the day different from any other day for me. I ought to tell you, mother."

"Don't tell anything that belongs to you as your own."

"No. But this belongs to you. I cannot rest without telling."

Helen was glad the darkness hid her face. She told her mother plainly what Van Shaw had said to her up there on the rock during the brief time they had been alone.

When Helen had apparently told all, Esther was silent. Helen began to feel frightened.

"Well, mother, you don't blame me, do you? Did I, have I—at any time given him any—any—encouragement to think—"

"No, no, dear, I am sure you have not been unmaidenly. But you do not know all—as I do, as others do, of this young man. I think you ought to know before you let your feeling, whatever it is, go farther."

And in a direct, plain way, as she had always talked with her children, Esther told Helen what Bauer had told her.

When she finished, the girl was silent so long that her mother began to fear again that deadening fear she had experienced of late whenever she had come to realize the girl's infatuation for the luxurious life. But Esther was not prepared for the question Helen asked when she broke her long silence.

"How did you come to know all this, mother? How do you know it is true?"

It was Esther's turn to be silent. If she told Helen that her source of information was Bauer, the girl might reasonably put it down as due to the jealousy of a rival, and so question its reliability. As a matter of fact, at that very moment, Van Shaw's parting words were in Helen's memory, "Don't believe all the stories you may hear about me."

"Mr. Bauer told me," said Esther slowly. "He knew the facts. They are known to others at Burrton. His only motive was to save you the—"

"He might spare himself the trouble," said Helen, sharply. "I can't help thinking he is interfering in my affairs and especially in Mr. Van Shaw's."

"He certainly interfered in his affairs when he saved his life to-night," said Esther quietly, and the words smote Helen almost like a blow. For she realised for the first time that night that her sympathy and imagination had been exercised almost wholly for Van Shaw, broken and bruised in that awful fall over the cliff. "Saved his life!" Bauer had done that! After telling her mother the story she had just heard! It was a most wonderful thing to do, as Elijah Clifford had said in his narrative out there a little while ago. And yet, and yet, she heard herself saying to her mother the next moment:

"It seems strange that Mr. Bauer should tell you this. It doesn't seem possible. I can't believe it!"

At that, Esther could not suppress a heart cry so full of agony that Helen was terrified.

"Mother! mother!" was all she could say. But Esther quickly calmed herself.

"Helen, if this young man should be unworthy of you, could you give yourself to him simply because he had money to offer?"

"No, no, mother, I am not wicked like that. You must not think so. I could not help questioning Mr. Bauer's statements. He is not altogether—" she could not say the word "disinterested," and her mother said it for her.

"But he knows how hopeless his case is. He is not expecting to gain any favor by telling me what he knows. Can you not see it is simply to save you from making the most awful mistake a girl can make in all her life when she unknowingly marries such a man? Bauer never expects to be a successful suitor. I do not believe you have any true measure of his feeling for you. But he is willing to risk anything to spare you misery. Cannot you see that? What other motive could he have? He is not a rival. The poor fellow told me frankly that he had given up all hope for himself. It is pure friendship, and it is so rare and so beautiful a thing that you cannot afford to trample it down or disbelieve the story he told me. Helen, if you should let your admiration for money and its power take such a step as to encourage a man like Van Shaw, it would break your mother's heart. But worse than that, it would break your own. Oh, you cannot, you will not do such a thing."

What could Helen say to that? And what less could Esther say to her? Let the careless mothers in America answer—the mothers who never talk frankly with their daughters about these things, and the careless daughters who never take their mothers into their confidence. How many unhappy marriages would never occur if mothers did their duty and daughters listened to and heeded the best friend they have on earth.

I did not know the sky could be
So very soft, so very blue;
I did not know the land and sea
Could spread so fair before my view,
Until I learned, one cloudless day,
To banish hatred from my heart,
To put my foolish doubts away
And bid my envy to depart.

THE QUESTION THAT IS ALWAYS WITH US

With ten millions of negroes in our midst, the race question is always with us; but now and then certain current events bring it more strongly to the front than usual. Two such occurencies have transpired, one bearing on the social, the other on the political status of the negro.

A few days ago the white wife of Jack Johnson, the black prize-fighter and heavy weight champion of the world, committed suicide; the reasons given were that she was a social outcast from both the white and black races.

A few weeks ago the Progressive party, with Colonel Roosevelt for its presidential candidate, practically eliminated the southern negro from its plan of campaign. Both of these events happened in the North; the non-recognition of the southern negro came from a branch of the Republican party—the one that was responsible for his enfranchisement. Southern prejudice, therefore, played no part in either of these significant occurrences.

These things make us feel that the negro problem is not yet solved, and that it is still our task to study it patiently and thoughtfully, in the light of the half century that has transpired since the Civil War. We should do this as Christians, because of our obligations to a needy and inferior race; we should do it as patriotic citizens, because, as Mr. Bryce says in his American Commonwealth, the presence in our midst of these millions of an alien race is one of the greatest problems and dangers that our government has to face.

Not a Disappearing Race.

First, let us look the salient facts in the face. It has been claimed by some (and the wish may have been father to the thought) that they are a disappearing race; it is said that they lack the stamina and vitality of the white race, that their unsanitary habits and surroundings make them an easy prey to certain diseases, and that their death rate is very high. But a study of our census reports shows that their birth rate is far in excess of their death rate—no alarm has ever been sounded (even by Mr. Roosevelt!) about race suicide among the negroes. The fact that they have more than doubled in numbers since the war forces us to abandon any such hypothesis as that. If we are looking for a disappearing race, we can find it in the Indians; they once owned and inhabited this continent, and now number less than three hundred thousand; they have but thousands now, while the negro has his millions.

Refuse to Be Colonized or Segregated.

The dream of transporting the negro to the Liberian Republic has proven to be an iridescent one—they flatly decline any such solution of the problem. They have strong local attachments, and are a timid and ease-loving race. There is nothing of the fibre of the pioneer in them; they are lacking in the hardihood to dare new conditions and endure new hardships.

Neither will they submit to being segregated by themselves. At one time there was some talk of setting apart a state for them in this country, but one who knows them realizes that they would never agree to that. One of the first aspirations of the well-to-do negro is to get away from the negro section of the town where he lives and move to a white folks' street.

If the negro continues to increase as he has in the past fifty years; if he will not be transported back to the country from whence he came; if he will not be set apart in communities by himself—he is here in our midst, and here to stay in ever-growing numbers. And it behooves us to look the situation straight in the face and deal with it as wisely and justly as we can.

In looking backward we can now see that certain mistakes have been made in our dealings with them, and that the negro has suffered as a result of them.

Glad Slaves are Free.

I am not alluding to slavery as one of these wrongs. I am thankful that they are free, and that the inherited burden of slavery is lifted from the South; yet, in a certain sense, the intimate association of a race fresh from barbarism with a superior race, in the home and on the plantation, brought about a quicker uplift and civilization than if they had come as immigrants, like the Chinese and Japanese. Many of the great plantations were industrial colonies, and were all but patriarchal in the relations of master and slave. While there were doubtless instances of the presence of the power of the master over the slave, yet, on the whole, those relations were kindly and mutually helpful; this statement is proved by the fact that while all the men, even the boys, of the South were in the army, and the negroes were left as protectors and bread-winners for the women and children, not a single instance of misuse of their power is on record, but innumerable examples are known of their fidelity and devotion to their helpless charges.

Three Mistakes.

One of these errors was in the way that this freedom was given to them. Their emancipation was immediate and unconditional, when it should have been gradual. Think of a child race, which had always been provided for, untrained, improvident, suddenly thrust out on the world, and told they were free to earn their own living!

Another mistake was giving unrestricted suffrage to such a race, some of them but a few generations from barbarism. How they fell into the hands of the Philistines, who used them for their own selfish and base ends; how the South suffered in the dread Reconstruction period, no tongue or pen has yet calmly and adequately told! But the negroes themselves were the worst sufferers, for they became the tools of unscrupulous politicians, who used them for their own ends, and the moral ideals of a simple and ignorant people suffered shipwreck, as far as citizenship was concerned. How much better to have given them suffrage slowly and with limitations, as we are giving it in the Philippine Islands!

False Education.

Another wrong they suffered was a false education—an education that unfitted them for the great lines of work opened to them, and left them untrained for the avenues of livelihood that they could follow. Our Census Bureau states that two-thirds of the negroes follow agriculture for their living, and more than one-half of the remaining third follow manual and industrial trades. We are just beginning to realize that they need education of the hand and eye, as well as of the brain.

The negro, then, is here, and here to stay. If it is true that certain mistakes have been made by his friends, it proves that we have yet much to learn in dealing with him. In our study of the problem, we should be swayed neither by race prejudice nor by gushing sentimentality. While the great majority of negroes still live in the South, yet the census figures indicate a steady migration to the North. In Washington, D. C., the negro population is 94,446. The North and the South must tackle the question together, for it is a national problem.

As for the political perplexities, suggested by the action of the Progressive party, the Modern Womanhood page is too diffident to suggest a solution, or even venture an opinion.

The Social Problem.

But as to the social problem, suggested by the suicide of the unhappy white wife of the black pugilist, it has very definite convictions, and is not loth to express them. They are that marriage between the two races is forbidden by the statutes in a majority of our states, and by public sentiment (with few exceptions) in all of them. With ten millions of negroes in our midst, it will not do for us to have any compromise on this question, if we wish to preserve race purity in our land. As nearly all of our social life is based on a meeting of the sexes, with marriage as a possible result, social relations between the races is impossible; where marriage is forbidden, social intercourse is out of the question. This is a hard doctrine, and many may not be able to receive it; but it is written by one who knows and loves the negro, and who believes she is writing as truly in their interests as in those of her own Anglo-Saxon race.

Mother's Face.

Three little boys talked together,
One sunny summer day,
And I leaned out of the window
To hear what they had to say.

"The prettiest thing I ever saw,"
One of the little boys said,
"Was a bird in grandpa's garden,
All black and white and red."

"The prettiest thing I ever saw,"
Said the second little lad,
"Was a pony at the show—
I wanted him awful bad."

"I think," said the third little fellow,
With a grave and gentle grace,
"That the prettiest thing in all the world
Is just my mother's face."

When you looked into my mother's eyes you knew, as if he had told you, why God sent her into the world—it was to open the minds of all who looked to beautiful thoughts. And that is the beginning and end of literature.—James M. Barrie.

Plymouth, Ind., 93 in past two years.

Youngstown, Ohio, First Church, is discussing a new building enterprise.

Georgia Disciples will hold their state convention at Rome, Nov. 5-8.

A new church house costing $15,000 was recently dedicated at Commerce, Tex.

East Side Church, Lincoln, Nebr., will build a new edifice costing close to $30,000.

John P. Sala, of Dayton, Ohio., was elected president of the union ministers' association.

Leroy M. Anderson, recently of Ada, Okla., has begun his new work with First Church, Macon, Ga.

An illustrated souvenir of the Scoville Mission in Australia has been reprinted from the Australian Christian.

E. M. Smith has been pastor at First Church, Decatur, Ill., four years. He has accomplished substantial and remarkable results in that time.

B. H. Hayden whose call to Beckley, W. Va., was recorded in these columns two weeks since has decided to remain with the church in London, Ont.

Colored Disciples in Bloomington, Ill., dedicated a new house of worship recently, with State Secretary J. Fred Jones officiating. George Hoagland is pastor.

The passing of J. A. Seaton at the home of his daughter in Santa Ana, Calif., removes a preacher widely esteemed in the Disciple fellowship. He labored many years in Iowa, one of his last pastorates being at Marion in that state.

A ten dollar limit was put upon gifts asked by Pastor Charles S. Medbury of his University Place congregation in Des Moines, Ia., to be used for repairing the church building. One thousand dollars was thus secured.

Tennessee state convention was held at Clarksville the week of Sept. 16. All the national societies were represented by secretaries on the program and in addition Ira M. Boswell, of Chattanooga, Carey E. Morgan, of Nashville, and Dr. Hall L. Calhoun, of Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., made addresses.

Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., has recently inaugurated the weekly offering plan for missions. Milo Atkinson, the pastor, has accepted a call for a third year with the church. An average of $6,000 per year is the record of the past two years. The minister will attend the Louisville convention with all expenses paid by the church.

With Evangelist B. L. Wray directing the movement, a new church was organized in the country five miles from Flanagan, Ill., and equi-distant from Long Point and Dana. The charter membership numbers twenty-four, and a building recently moved from a distant location has been granted for the permanent use of the new congregation.

Dr. Sun, of China, is a Christian man. He was the first president of the Chinese Republic. He is one of the best and ablest men that country has produced. For fifteen years he has worked day and night with pen and voice under the ban, and often in imminent danger, and all for the supreme purpose of leading his beloved land out of the slavery of the Manchu lords.

Professor Grubbs' Passing.

The death of the venerable I. B. Grubbs, for many years teacher in the College of the Bible at Lexington, Ky., is announced. Professor Grubbs was associated intimately with the late Professors Charles L. Loos and J. W. McGarvey. His death occurred on Sept. 18. Alumni of the College of the Bible and the Disciples brotherhood generally will respond with tender feelings to the news of his passing.

Five Years Remarkable Growth.

Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, is celebrating the beginning of its pastor's sixth year. Since Burris A. Jenkins became its minister this congregation has grown from 585 persons to 1,200. Announcement is made of the early beginning on the new $50,000 addition to the present beautiful church building. The new portion will be built especially for carrying on the work of religious education of which Richard W. Gentry is director.

Achievements at South Bend.

Geo. Watson Henry has begun his seventh year as pastor of the First Christian Church, South Bend, Ind. In the six-years' ministry just closed, the work has made a general advance. Among other accomplishments, a new building has been erected at a cost of $50,000. The second anniversary of the dedication will be observed the first Lord's day in October. During the minister's vacation the pulpit was supplied one Sunday by P. J. Rice and three Sundays by W. C. Bower very acceptably.

Churches Want Union Men.

An interesting item of increasing recurrence in the correspondence of committees seeking new pastors is the statement that he must be willing and prepared to follow up the movement toward the parctice of Christian unity which the church has been fostering. Evidently the churches are tired of "fighting the sects," and wish leaders who can interpret the new spirit of cooperation and unity that is abroad throughout Christendom. And the churches wish with increasing earnestness to practice the unity which they ask their leaders to preach.

Church to Keep Open Daily.

First Church, Bloomington, Ill., will keep its doors open every day from 8 a. m. to 5 p. m. Passers by are invited to enter for rest, meditation or prayer. "Just why a church should be closed and locked fast six days in the week is a question I have never seen satisfactorily answered," says Edgar De Witt Jones the pastor. "Time and again I have sought to enter some of the large city churches and found them locked. Of course there are exceptions, but very few of the churches other than the Catholic and Episcopal are open daily for worshipers or visitors."

A. R. Moore's Record at Birmingham.

A. R. Moore closed nine and a half fruitful years of ministry in Birmingham, Ala., on August 25. There were two added at the last service making 146 this year and 910 for the period of his Birmingham ministry. The church roll revised to date contains the names of 575 resident members and 121 non-resident. The congregation erected and paid for the present house of worship, organized two new churches, one of which is now self-sustaining and has become a living link in both the Home and Foreign fields. Mr. Moore has begun his new work at Savannah, Ga.

Prayer for Moslem world.

The World's Evangelical Alliance asks all Christians everywhere to set aside Wednesday, October 16, as a day of prayer for the Moslem world. This date is the hundredth anniversary of the death of Henry Martyn, who was a pioneer in the evangelization of Moslem lands. The topics suggested for prayers are as follows: (1) For Moslem Governments and for Christian rulers in Moslem lands. (2) For the wider circulation of the Word of God and Christian literature among Moslems. (3) For those engaged in the ministry of healing in all hospitals and dispensaries throughout the Mohammedan world. (4) For all preachers and evangelists among Moslems, and for their message of reconciliation. For converts. (5) For the arrest of Mohammedan progress in Africa: the success of missions on the border-marches of Islam: and that all Christian societies in these regions may realize the need of working.

Opposition is Plainly Weakening.

The article by I. J. Spencer in reply to inquiries on the representative convention plan, appearing elsewhere in this issue, taken with E. F. Daugherty's incisive polemic in the Christian Standard of last week on the same subject, should, and doubtless will, effectually settle any lingering opposition or fear with respect to the committee's report. The Standard's weakness has not been so manifest in any battle it has fought since the Pittsburgh program fray as in its attempt at answering Mr. Daugherty. It begins to look as if the new order of convention will be organized at Louisville with none save negligible opposition.

An Evangelistic College President.

Chancellor William Oeschger of Cotner University and President R. H. Crossfield of Transylvania University are two heads of Disciple colleges who engage in an itinerant ministry including the conducting of evangelistic meetings. During the past year Mr. Oeschger delivered 177 sermons, 113 addresses before churches, conventions, and school teachers. He held six revival meetings, in which 196 persons came forward either to take membership with the church or to make the good confession. One church was dedicated. Two national educational congresses were attended. Addresses were delivered before eight district church conventions, and one state convention.

Healing as Well as Teaching and Preaching.

First Church, Louisville, Ky., E. L. Powell, pastor, maintains a free clinic and dispensary in the city, ministering thus to the healing of the body as well as the healing of the soul. The support of the institution comes from the "Christian Educational Society," an incorporated organization within the church which engages besides this in many good works. In a small way the dispensary is a metropolitan hospital, where delicate surgical operations are items of the day's work. Not only is the service of a specialist provided the sufferer, but medicine is given those in need. The optically imperfect are treated and, where necessary, deserving people who are not able to buy glasses are fitted free of charge. The clinic is open daily. Public-spirited and charitably-inclined doctors, each a specialist in his line, have devoted hours of each day to the cause.

Steps to Life's Summit.

"I am," "I can," "I ought," "I will"—these four affirmations, said W. F. Richardson at First Church, Kansas City, recently, mark the steps by which man mounts to the summit of life. "First, 'I am,'" said Mr. Richardson. "This means self-consciousness or realizing of one's personality. Second, 'I can.' Young men wait for a 'pull' to bring them to success, when 'push' is what they need. Duty is always and everywhere possible. We can do the very things for which we were made, if we will. Third, 'I ought,' the consciousness of responsibility. None are free from this obligation save those who lack personality and power. The individual of normal estate is bound to make the best possible use of his opportunities and abilities. Fourth, 'I will.' This is self-expression, or consciousness of character. Not until one merges his personal consciousness into recognition of power and acknowledgment of obligation, can he be said to have attained to real character."

Secretary Corey in Africa.

Stephen J. Corey writes under date of July 28 that he is on board the Oregon steaming up the swift Mombayo river through the dense Congo forest. He says, "The Oregon is a splendid steamer and made the swift currents, the sharp curves, and the strong whirlpools beautifully. Ray Eldred and the writer baptized seventeen persons today. This is the most distant point yet touched. Herbert Smith of Lotumbe sent evangelists here about six months ago—these are first fruits. The communion service was held under the trees near the Oregon today. We return and go on to Monieka. Mr. Smith, Mr. Hobgood and Mr. Holder stay for a ten days journey through the back country. Had the joy of accompanying Ray Eldred on a 25-mile journey through the forest yesterday. It was hard walking but a joyous experience. We passed through villages aggregating 10,000 people who had never seen a white teacher before. They listened to the gospel gladly and asked for teachers to be sent them."

An Apparent Contradiction

In talking with an intelligent woman in a central Illinois church the other day I got an "eye-opener." She reminded me of the figures recently prepared by Pres. R. H. Crossfield and published by the Bible School Department of the A. C. M. S. She said, "I understand there was an increase in our congregations in 1909 of 110; that the increase in five years is 397; that the decrease in ministers in 1911 was 177; that the decrease in five years is 620; that the number of vacant pulpits in 1912 was 2,090; and that the number of preachers required in these vacant fields is 1,200." She paused a moment to get my endorsement of the facts, which I gave with emphasis. She added with a twinkle in her eye, "Our preacher has resigned, but will not leave us for a month or so. But we have already had eighty applications for the pulpit. How do you explain?"

I could not explain to her entire satisfaction, although I talked quite long and loud for ordinary conversation. It is almost useless to publish figures when the facts seem to be against us. I have come to the conclusion after a few years' work at the problem, that our system is wrong. Don't get excited. I am not settling the problem this morning; but a prophet is needed. Who is a candidate for the office?

H. H. PETERS.

An Open Reply to Inquiries

The writer has been requested to answer a number of questions concerning the "Report of the Committee on the Reconstruction and Unification of our Missionary and Philanthropic Interests."

He will be brief in order that room may be fund for immediate publication. At present, also, he will confine his answers to seven questions propounded by the Christian Standard in its issue of September 14.

First: "How and by whom was this committee appointed?" Answer: The report gives a history of its genesis confirmed by the minutes of the last six annual conventions.

Second: "By whom were the additional three members chosen after the Topeka convention?" Answer: The minutes of the Topeka convention (A. C. M. S.) state that the motion prevailed to appoint three additional members, not allied with the societies, and that President Ainslie appointed the new committeemen.

Third: "Is the opinion of Brother Idleman that we need a bishop, or that of four other members of the committee that we need a newspaper 'whose editorial policy can be controlled' and 'that can speak in a representative way,' shared by the entire committee?" Answer: The committee has never made inquisition as to any "opinion" of its members. Those who appointed it evidently thought its members were sound in "the faith," and neither it nor the Scriptures authorized any ecclesiastical inquiry, such as the Standard makes, on the score of "opinion."

A note from Mr. Idleman says on this point: "It is perfectly clear, I think, to any body who wants to be fair and thinks at all about our chaotic independence that there is need of conservation and administration that shall save our churchless pastors and pastorless churches and of making us an organized efficient in the kingdom. This is all I dreamed of implying. Of course no one of us stands for the implication of authority in the office of bishop."

The opinion of the four that we need a newspaper "whose editorial policy can be controlled" and that "can speak in a representative way" means that "can be controlled" by the teaching and spirit of Christ and by nothing else; and will truly represent him and not misrepresent his followers. The four would oppose any other control or representation.

Fourth: "Is it quite just that thus far the whole matter has been handled by representatives of the societies, not one single church having been asked to send a delegate to the meetings? Answer this, bearing in mind that the societies are to profit by the new arrangement (presumably) and the churches furnish the funds." Answer: Those who have wrought out this report have made their allegiance to Christ and the churches supreme. If in any wise the societies had seemed antagonistic to the churches the committee would have stood for the churches as against the societies. So far as the writer has been able to see the societies have stood for the well-being, efficiency and coöperation of the churches in carrying out the revealed will and commission of our Lord and for nothing else. They ask nothing for themselves and seek the wise guidance of the churches. All the churches represented in the conventions that appointed and reappointed the committee are also represented in the committee and its meetings. Moreover the churches, far more than the societies, are expected to profit by the new arrangement. The very fact that they furnish the funds is one reason why the new arrangement would be profitable to them. Another reason is that if the report be adopted the churches will be able to direct far better than they can now direct the work of the societies. Moreover the churches of Christ are now urged to send delegates to the Louisville meeting especially to handle this report. The convention asked that the report of our committee be published thirty days before the next annual convention, and the committee in order to give the greater publicity and interest to the report published it sixty days in advance of the coming convention. It would be unfair to discourage one single church from sending its delegate or delegates to the Louisville meeting where the representatives of the churches may freely handle this matter.

Fifth, the Standard asks: "Can you cite any case in the world's history where any civilized people formed a league, federation or central government on a representative basis without asking the units interested to select delegates for the purpose of discussing the proposed organization?" Answer, No. To do so or even to attempt to do it, would be absurd. The committee never contemplated such a thing. The report plans for a delegate representation of the churches as one of its most fundamental principles. This principle once adopted and established, the churches can be trusted to coöperate worthily and wisely. The "units" are cordially invited to consider and discuss the new arrangement to be submitted by the committee.

Sixth: "Does the plan contemplate an arrangement whereby other organizations that may be formed for like or similar purposes, may secure recognition before our annual meetings?" Yes. The right of approval or the right of disapproval, would be exercised by the convention. (Art. III; sec. 2).

Seventh: "To what assembly of the Louisville gathering, and on what day, will this report be submitted, and what opportunity will be given for discussion?" Answer: The writer is informed that the program soon to come from the press provides for the report at the general meeting of the convention, Saturday morning, October 19. It should have a full, deliberate consideration; should be frankly and comprehensively explained and discussed. And above all the presence and the power, the spirit and the guidance of the Lord Jesus should be faithfully sought and realized.

Lexington, Ky. I. J. SPENCER.

The New England Convention

The New England Convention of the Disciples of Christ convened with the church in this city on Sept. 12. The convention was largely attended by representative members of the churches, and showed a high type of Christian manhood and womanhood.

The spirit of the convention was commendable. It was devotional. The practice of prayer and praise was prominent. Coleridge tells us that the devotional spirit of the churches suffered by that necessary evil, the Reformation. But the devotional frame of mind in this convention did not seem to be depressed by the demands of the great problems of these days that appeal to the logic of the intellect as well as to the sensibilities of the heart. And the spirit was affable. People were admitted to social intercourse without reserve. The social feature of the convention was more like the friendliness of a county convention of churches in Kentucky or Missouri. The convention spirit was unitive. There were as few discordant notes struck and as few chords of a pessimistic tone sounded as one will hear in any convention of the Disciples.

All the addresses were of a high order. It would be pleasing to the writer to refer to all of them did space permit; but reference must be made to three of them. The address of Dr. I. N. McCash on American Missions was regarded as a piece of work of surpassing excellence. Dr. McCash's great speech will advance the interests of the truth, will open American eyes to dangers that express hostile intention to our national liberties and will commend the mission work of the Disciples wherever delivered before a Protestant audience. The sermon by L. C. McPherson on prayer and forgiveness was a speech that touched a tender spot with us and that magnified the forces on which Christ is relying for the perpetuity and extension of his kingdom. The address of Dr. O. P. Gifford, the gifted Baptist pastor in this city, was an inspiring revelation of truth. His sentences were clean cut and polished like gems sparkling with the epigrammatic, the outcropping of a delicate vein of humor here and there seasoning his sentences with sunshine, and the whole speech, luminous with prophetic thought, cast a vision of hope and inspiration against the growing future. Two other Baptist pastors were introduced to the convention and they made felicitous responses. This fraternity was a conspicuous feature of the convention, and is calculated to do good.

The work of L. C. McPherson, our New England evangelist for the past convention year, showed zeal combined with knowledge. His influence among the churches is as irenic as his work is constructive. He is brightening the outlook of a number of our churches. The most of his work cannot be represented by mathematics. The work of Mr. McPherson is opening a new era of advanced movement along New Testament lines among our New England churches. Many are the difficulties that confront us; and the inspiration of the churches to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, and to grasp a larger hope is an imperative necessity. Our churches must find an impelling force of passion that will stimulate them to push to the front. The Christianity around the band-wagon is as true as it is anywhere else along the line of procession. We must grow dissatisfied with present attainments, and the growth must be rapid. And Disciples coming to New England from the South and West should stand loyally by their colors!

E. J. Teagarden of Danbury, Conn., was the efficient and dignified president. Pray for the work of Mr. McPherson.

A Race Against Time

Everywhere the new secretary of ministerial relief has gone there has been a prompt response to the emergency call for the completion of the $20.000 necessary to claim a special gift of $4,000 extra on Sept. 30. The effort has developed into an exciting race against time.

After the Phillips bequest of $5,000 and the payment of $500 from the Reed estate came in, only twenty-two days remained to the end of the missionary year. Judging by past Septembers. it was estimated that each of these days should bring an average of one hundred dollars of regular receipts from churches and individuals. This left an equal amount to be secured in the field—$2,200 in twenty-two days!

The first half of the time has passed so successfully, with Pittsburgh, Lancaster convention, Johnstown, Greensburg, and Connellsville, Pa., and St. Louis, and Kansas City, Mo., making up the hundreds for the succeeding days, that we feel confident of winning the $4,000, if only the regular receipts keep up.

The last day of September falls on Monday. Of course remittances made on that day will not be received until October 1 or later, but will be counted in this year's receipts. We are not anxious about 1913. Undoubtedly we shall then have not less than $30,000 general receipts and $6,000 extra from the 20 per cent proposition. But we must have the $20,000 and the $4,000 this year.

Getting the Million

At our board meeting Sept. 5, the following churches were promised help: Williamsport, Pa., $3,500. at 6 per cent; Ardmore, Okla., $4,000; Branch, Mo.. $250; Laberne, Okla., $500; North Middletown, Ky., $600; and Chelan, Wash., $1,500.

During the month of August the following loans were paid gy our treasurer: Amity, Ore., 4 per cent, $1,500; Donna, Tex., 4 per cent, $600; Watertown, S. D. 4 per cent, $3,500; Kingman, Kan., 6 per cent, $5,000; Lucien, Okla., 4 per cent, $400.

The church at Pomona, Calif., sends $300 saying, "There is more to follow." John Booth, the associate secretary, was present at Pomona the morning of the offering. First Church, Louisville, Ky., sends $300 on its home fund, and so does Linwood Boulevard Church of Kansas City. First Church, Akron, O., expects to send $500 on its home fund.

The best reports of all are coming from some of the churches helped in the past by the Church Extension Board. Many homeless churches meeting in halls and store-rooms are doubling collections of last year, stating that they appreciate the need of a new church. Many churches are falling into line for the first time this year, saying that they want to help reach the million dollar fund.

Individual gifts are encouraging the board. One good man sent $250, and, being suddenly prospered, has sent another gift of $500. The skies look bright and the day of the million dollar fund is dawning. Many annuity gifts are coming.

When you read this, preachers, please go to your treasurers and tell them to send your church offering to G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Building, Kansas City, Mo., at once, by check, so that it reaches the board on Monday, Sept. 30, and you will have your part in getting the million. The secretaries are visiting individuals, churches and conventions, as fast as the trains will carry them, in order to reach the goal. Let us prove what a united effort can do.

Benevolent Association News

The association has just received another good annuity. This time it comes from a new friend or perhaps an old friend who has just formed the annuity habit. In sending in his annuity gift this good brother said, "This is simply the beginning. I am intending to send you much more for your blessed ministry."

The following is the new list of officers of the Southern Home at Atlanta, Ga.: President, C. B. LeCraw; vice-presidents. W. O. Foster, T. O. Hathcock, and Mrs. Charles Goodwin; and treasurer, J. C. Gentry. Mr. LeCraw. the newly elected president, is superintendent of the Bible-school of the First Church. There is much enthusiasm over the Home. He is doing the work that reflects credit upon our cause in the South.

The association has just succeeded in making a deal with Mr. C. N. Hatch of Walla Walla, Wash., by which it is able to clear the indebtedness from its farm in Walla Walla. The next step to be taken is the erection of a building. We have nothing but a five room cottage for the care of our old people.

It is only three weeks till the books close. From present indications we will be compelled to go to Louisville showing a record of less money collected this year than last. If this should prove to be true, it will be the first time in seven years that the association has not been able to report a financial gain. Several of our homes are embarassed with debt. Brethren, help us to report at Louisville that they are all clear. If you have not had fellowship with Christ in the last twelve months, the opportunity is now yours. Jas. H. Mohorter.

— An Editorial

CHICAGO

"Lord, That I May Receive My Sight"

'Tis not the thing we see that makes life fair,
But that with which we see it. Oft we're blind
To radiant rainbows, when we long to find
The gold at the far end. How crushing care
Makes darkness all around! The deadly snare
Of trival commonplace—the thought unkind,
Centered in self—these must we put behind
If we would reach the vision we would share.

And so, to see the loveliness of earth,
And sea, and sky—to have the secret sign
That shows the good in man—to find no dearth
Of holy beauty in all things divine—
Our prayer must ever be each day and night,
"Good Master, that I may receive my sight."

IDA WITHERS HARRISON.

The Conqueror

I like the man who faces what he must
With heart triumphant and a step of cheer;
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fail, yet keeps unfaltering trust
That God is God; that somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp; better ,with love, a crust
Than living in dishonor; envies not,
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor even murmurs at his humbler lot;
But with a smile and words of hope, gives zest
To every toiler; he alone is great
Who by a life heroic conquers fate.

The Call of the Christ

The Chicago Daily News says: "Christ calls men to himself, and through vision, love and possession one grows on to likeness. Jesus is the living expression of God's life in terms of humanity, and he is the supreme manifestation of the normal humanity. His life is the one character most easy to reproduce. Christ's call is to intellect, heart and will, to rouse the best manhood of this age, and for it all the world, says the author, is waiting. This is an illuminating, hope bringing, strengthening work."

The Baptist Commonwealth says: "Only a few men could have written this masterly exposition of the character of Jesus. It is a work of striking power and reality—a vital, living, convincing portrayal. Scholarly, yet simple, philosophical yet understandable, original in phraseology yet lucid, a positive yet persuasive presentation of the claims of Christ. It will strengthen the faith of those in doubt, cheer the sorrowing, give courage to the fearful, bring hope to the despairing—in a word, impart to every reader a satisfactory and realistic vision of the Master."

The Watchman says: "People who have listened to Prof. Willett as a public speaker have been impressed by the clearness, simplicity and logic with which he expresses his ideas. The same characteristics appear in the volume under notice. It is a scholarly, philosophical and understandable presentation of a great theme."

Basic Truths of Christian Faith

Paper, 127 pages, 35 cents.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis

Cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50c. Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period. The author says:

Are We Cheapening the Church?

ON THIS page last week we considered the necessity of self-culture as a condition of effective self-sacrifice. The self-respect of Jesus, his consciousness of his dignity even when humbling himself to wash his disciples' feet, gave significance and worth to his self-abnegation. He never cheapened his personality. He did not spend his resources in petty and weak activities for others. He conserved the rich capital of his soul and invested it where it brought about the redemption of the world.

Passing beyond the application of this example of Jesus to our personal life it involves no stretch of the principle to apply it to the Church life also. Our modern Christianity is emphasing the active, pragmatic, institutional side of the Christian life. We are asked by our leaders to do many things. Our churches are the scene of much bustle and noise. The "bee hive" ideal possesses us. We are exhorted to get up "boosters clubs." The committee on securing a new pastor says he must be a "hustler" and a "live wire." There is much strife for the "front rank" standard. To supply the dearth of candidates for the ministry short-cut training schools for ministers encourage the delusion that education is a negligible quantity in Christian leadership.

Evangelism waxes more and more hypnotic and unspiritual. Its methods often leave the church cheapened in the eyes of the community. A passion for numbers obsesses us. "Personal work" is organized on an unnatural and mechanical plan. The divine shyness of the soul with respect to its deeper spiritual experiences and purposes is scoffed at and broken down. Vulgar words and phrases have coarsened the vocabulary of grace. Our ministers have given up trying to teach us anything and have taken to exhorting us.

"Church work" does not connote to the average mind a very high and attractive kind of labor. It consists mainly in cooking, sewing and begging. The restaurant side of our church life is conspicuous. Our ladies have a great reputation for their dinners. We were never so busy. There never was more bustle and motion and organization than to-day. A pastor was complaining the other day that it required the best part of two days each week to prepare the "copy" for his four-page parish paper. On looking over the paper it was found to be filled with small gossip.

Take for an additional and luminous example the familiar trick played upon the community in the matter of dedicating a new church building. The structure has been completed on faith. Perhaps not more than one-half the money has been provided for in advance. A great "dedication" service is widely announced. The noble impulse of the people to worthily present the new house to God moves them to come into the divine presence with reverential and joyous emotions. The first portion of the service is arranged with an unwonted eye for dignity and devotion. The choir sings a Te Deum Laudamus. Great hymns are voiced by the congregation. Solomon's noble dedicatory prayer is read by the minister. The organ lifts the people's feelings up in paeans of praise. It is indeed the house of God, the very gate of heaven.

Then the "sermon" is begun. The preacher is not the pastor, but a professional "dedicator." He has organized an address which leaves the high plane of worship, not too abruptly, and gradually descends to the level of the cheaper emotions, so that the pocketbook can be shaken loose. By turns he induces tears and laughter. The "solicitors" are then commanded to move up and down the aisles, to receive and announce pledges so the house may be "dedicated" free of debt. Cheap puns and coarse wit are the order of the hour. The "dedicator" talks like an auctioneer. Confusion reigns in the congregation. The uplift of the day has ended in anti-climax. But the money has been secured!

Has such a house been truly dedicated? Has this unique opportunity to invest these stones with the idealism of religion been adequately improved? No sensitive soul will so affirm. The house has been cheapened. The congregation has been cheapened. The memory of that day that might have been rich and fragrant for all the years has been coarsened. And a flippant attitude toward the house of God has by the procedure of that day been cultivated.

The good intentions of the Church in all this cannot be called in question It is thoroughly in earnest. Its passion to serve mankind was never so urgent as today. The Church is washing more feet than ever in its history. Its back is bent in the attitude of service. We yearn to help people, to bring them to Christ, and we literally beg for converts and recruits, yes, for mere auditors. Why, then, are the church's services so often spurned?

May it not be just because we beg so hard?

Might not our appeal be stronger if we kept it more in reserve?

Are we cheapening the Church and the gospel?

Is not our evangelism degrading the character of the Church? Where we gain one recruit by the prevailing evangelistic procedure who will say that we do not lose two? In the meeting which reports one thousand conversions there is no way to count the losses by alienation, by disgust, by disillusionment, by a weakening of respect for the Church. Are our cheap music and our tinsel attractions and our hortatory preaching lowering the dignity, the inward self-respect, of the Church which Christ bought with his blood? Are our small services robbing the mighty lantern of its oil? Is the Church conscious of its royalty when it takes the world's feet in its hands to wash them?

No profounder or more timely question can be put to the Church's intelligence than this. Doing counts for little without being. Self-sacrifice is futile without self-appreciation.

The need of the Church of today is not more organization or action, but more quiet reverence and self-appreciation. To self-denial we should add self-affirmation. The frenzied, feverish Church needs the calmness, the self-reserve of her Lord. His self-respect should reappear in her consciousness also. He was not a beggar nor a servant. He was a King serving.

The Church, his bride, must be his Queen.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

A Notable Book on World Peace

One of the greatest contributions on the peace question ever made is the recent book by David Starr Jordan, "Unseen Empire," published by the American Unitarian Association.

The title of the book is suggested by the thesis that the real rulers of the world at the present time are the financiers. The house of the Rothschilds is now worth two billions of dollars. This has been made in large measure by financing the war projects of the world and in furnishing money to nations to pay their indemnities. There are now other families engaging in this business which Doctor Jordan calls "pawn-broking" so that the Rothschild family has turned aside to other forms of investment, but a few families in Europe, and they in perfect understanding with each other, determine the destinies of Europe.

When a nation has a small debt and large credit, emissaries of these pawn-broking houses employ yellow newspapers to stir race antipathies that result in war. No nation has on hand the money to finance a war and they all turn to the money-lender. When the borrowing nation pursues war to the end of its credit, the war stops as it did in the case of Russia in her struggle with Japan.

The burden of national debt thus saddled upon the great nations will be a tax for all time to come, for many of them are now so burdened that they will never be able to do more than to pay the interest. The debt of Great Britain is now equal to four billions of dollars in our money. The debt of France is about six billions of dollars. The debt of the German states is about five billions of dollars. The per capita burden on the population can be easily figured and shows how heavy is the load of debt, nearly all of which has been spent in maintaining wars during the past century. The nineteenth century was the spendthrift century which not only spent its own resources but borrowed heavily against the future in order to carry out plans for national self-aggrandizement.

The End of War

There is an optimistic note in President Jordan's book which is encouraging to all those who look for the fulfilment of the prophetic word, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." The reasons assigned for the near end of wars between the great nations are interesting and compelling.

Not only are the nations too deep in debt to afford more war, but war is too expensive even for nations that have no debt. Most of the ancient causes of war would not justify a world power in expending a million dollars a day to carry on hostilities.

Furthermore, the development of the International Court at the Hague has rendered war unnecessary. The development of the proper machinery for settling national issues peaceably is a great guarantee of peace.

There are also passing certain ancient fallacies which have been the support of war. Nations once believed they needed to conquer a country to enjoy its trade. The trade of Germany in South America is a refutation of this foolishness. Many other examples might be furnished. Again there has been what Doctor Jordan calls the "Mirage of the Map." Nations have been hungry to extend dominion even over worthless country which will be an expense rather than a help. We are coming to learn that it is not territorial size that makes a nation great.

The development of science has also made war impossible. The machinery of war is now too terrible. The agents of destruction are so wonderfully constructed that the expense of human life is too great for war to go on.

The last and most compelling reason is the growth of civilization. War has depended upon narrow racial and national feelings. Commerce and education is making all the world one nation, in spite of our petty boundary lines between states. With the coming of this sense of human solidarity, all war will seem like civil war and internecine strife. As such it will be odious.

Peace Between Italy and Turkey

A commission of Turkish and Italian delegates has been in session at Lausanne, Switzerland since August and has settled upon the principal terms upon which peace may be established. Turkey will allow Italy to occupy Tripoli and receive in return some Italian territory on the Red Sea. Thus Italy gains a strip of territory on the Mediterranean which makes the map look better for Italy but which really is a burden rather than a help to that country, burdened as it is with debt. There can be no more pointed illustration of the foolishness of war for territorial expansion than is afforded in this expensive war costing $350,000 a day. In southern Italy, thousands are on the verge of starvation. Meanwhile social progress and philanthropy wait upon the war lords in all those countries which exalt militarism.

Social Study in the Sunday-school

Of all the various devices employed for keeping men interested permanently in the Sunday-school, the study of social questions has proven the most effective. The class can be conducted in a truly religious way for there is scarcely any modern reform which does not have its roots in the ideals of the holy scriptures. The man of today is supremely interested in human questions. He talks them in politics and organizes clubs to promote them. We now have an abundance of the most excellent helps for the study of social questions in classes. In the University of Chicago Constructive Series for the Sunday-school there is a splendid volume by Professor Henderson. We have already mentioned the monthly lesson book issued by Josiah Strong called the Gospel of the Kingdom. For the average class, this is worked up in the most usable form of any material we know. The teacher might well provide himself with Bliss' New Cyclopedia of Social Reform. This is a very thesaurus of information on the current human questions, and is to be found in every social worker's library. The public libraries now have many of the reference books that are referred to in Josiah Strong's lessons.

Flying the Red Flag

Judge Francis J. Swayze, of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, has put a quietus, in that state at least, on those who would limit the liberties of our fellow-citizens, the socialists. The test case was over the right of a policeman to arrest a man for displaying the red flag. The judge has sensibly taken the position that the red flag is a party emblem and as such may be shown quite as legitimately as the red bandanna of the progressive party, or any other party emblem. The Socialist may be right or wrong according to our own individual judgment of the case, just like the rest of us. This decision following the impeachment of a judge in a western state who refused to naturalize a man on account of his being a socialist ought to dispose for all time of those narrow-minded individuals who would hope to make progress against socialist theory by medieval methods.

The New Constitution in Ohio

Those who have believed that political radicalism had its permanent home in the west, received a rude shock this fall in the adoption of the new constitution in Ohio, the most radical political document in many ways to be found in the world. The most important changes are those relating to the initiative and referendum and to the municipal ownership of public utilities. Some measures failed of passage such as the abolishment of capital punishment, limitation of injunction and of court power in contempt cases, bonds for road building, and woman's suffrage. These will doubtless be presented to the people of Ohio again for consideration under the initiative and referendum, for 10 per cent of the people may secure consideration of a constitutional amendment by petition and 6 per cent may initiate a popular vote on a law within constitutional limitations. This state has been the home of such politicians as Mark Hanna and Boss Cox of Cincinnati. The people of Ohio have at last provided themselves with the proper remedy for handling such political leaders.

It is a Christian ideal that men should live unstained by the world. It is not practical or desirable for active people to refrain from associating with any who are sinful. Jesus was bitterly criticized for mingling with the sinful. In following Him, we ought not to associate often with those who are thoroughly bad, unless, like Him, we are doing service of reform. It is all a matter of common sense and adherence to the ideals of the Master. Certainly in his personal life he who pleases Christ must be pure.—Selected.

The Letter to Philemon

The letter to Philemon has been called a mere pendant to the Epistle to the Colossians, inasmuch as it is addressed to a member of that church. It is a private letter. Its aim was to point an individual to his duty. It therefore gives us some knowledge of how the apostle dealt with persons whom he sought to influence.

Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, committed a wrong of some sort and ran away from his master. He came to Rome where he met Paul and was converted by him to Christianity. He made himself so serviceable to his benefactor that Paul desired to retain him as a helper. But he was still the slave of Philemon, hence the apostle felt it to be his duty to send the slave back to the master. The letter we are studying was written that Philemon might be led to receive his slave kindly and to forgive him.

The power of the gospel is well illustrated in the conversion of this slave. "It is difficult," say Conybeare and Howson, "to imagine any portion of mankind more utterly depraved than the associates among whom a runaway pagan slave must have found himself in the capital. Profligate and unprincipled as we know even the highest and most educated society to have been then, what must have been its dregs and offal? Yet from this lowest depth Onesimus was dragged by the hand of Christian love." The hopeless sinner may be hopeless because the church in his neighborhood has lost faith in the power of Christ to save men.

That Paul returned a slave to his master is an offense to some who have fought to set men free. These persons think the church ought to have been an abolition society from the beginning. It was, but it did not adopt the methods of modern agitators. It taught the world to respect every soul, the soul of the slave as well as the soul of the master. When the world had learned this lesson fairly well, it began to see the inconsistency in slavery. Then the agitator had his chance. His abuse of Christianity was evidence of his ignorance of history.

Good conduct is possible where social conditions fall short of the ideal. Masters may be good men although slavery is bad. They may be kind to their slaves and provide for their material and spiritual welfare. The conservative who sees good in things as they are is not an enemy of mankind who delights in injustice. He has reason for his convictions and they are good ones. He becomes a sinner when he sees only the good and is averse to progress. There is value in rules regulating the conduct of slaves and masters. He is a servant worthy of honor who improves these rules. Not all the honor should go to the man who changes fundamentally the social organization.

The socializing power of the religion of Christ is seen in the incident of Philemon and Onesimus. "Master and slave were united in one fellowship. At the table of their common Lord they were known as brethren, and not as bond and free. No color line was drawn. The Phrygian slave Onesimus was equal before the Lord with the noblest Roman patrician. Slaves were even permitted to occupy the highest offices in the church. Thus within the church were planted the seeds of a true socialism, a socialism which, if it did not lead to an obliteration of social distinctions, led to the recognition of moral worth as the basis of that ideal social union after which the world has always been striving."—The Teachings of the Books.

The manner in which Paul exercises his personal influence is instructive. We sometimes think a man must ride roughshod over the convictions of others in order to enforce his own convictions. We got this notion from the days when opinions were enforced with a war club. Paul was great enough to respect the rights of the other man. He trusted the good sense and fairness of the man whom he sought to influence. His apostolic duties were many and heavy. He might have reasoned that they justified him in appropriating the slave of Philemon without waiting for the master's consent. We often have so great a sense of our importance that we use the property and infringe upon the rights of our neighbors. Paul wrote "But without thy mind I would do nothing; that thy goodness should not be of necessity, but of free will." It would have profited Philemon little to do a deed he could not help doing. The World's Sorrow

"This is a cruel world" said a friend recently. "Think of the storms that sweep away property and life, the lightning stroke that smites with death, the earthquake that shakes great cities into ruins and destroys hundreds of human beings." Yes, and the bitterest experiences of life are not caused by storm or earthquake, but by human frailty and sin. Many a boy has passed safely through the years to manhood, unharmed by the forces of nature, only to break the hearts of parents and friends by making moral shipwreck. Many a girl has survived the diseases of childhood, the physical dangers to which all are liable, to live in such a way that those who love her best would have been spared a world of sorrow had she died in babyhood.

The age-long effort to explain sorrow and suffering and sin ends in failure. To the everlasting "Why?" comes no answer but the echo of our cry. A mother asks, "Why should my little lad be taken while others are spared who have no care, no help to good living." The wife asks, "Why should my husband be stricken down when life was just beginning, when he was upright and good and useful, while hundreds of useless and vicious men prolong their days?" The child asks, "Why should my mother suffer a thousand deaths and then be taken from us just when we needed her most?" So multitudes question and no one gives satisfying answers. It is not enough to tell them that God has taken their loved ones, for they would know why he has taken them by way of bitter suffering, or why their, seemingly, untimely death.

To dwell upon this side of human life too much is to become morbid and incapable of seeing life as it is. Nature is beneficent as well as cruel. Devastating storms and destructive earthquakes are exceptional. Days filled with sunshine come and go, springtime clothes the earth with verdure, the mellow, golden autumn brings its gracious harvests, and we accept all these as a matter of course with little or no sense of gratitude. The truth of the old adage that "Blessings brighten as they take their flight" is realized by every one who is at all thoughtful concerning himself. We sense our sorrow and suffering, and go largely insensible to our happiness. Days filled with blessings come and go, and we not only fail to "count them" but are unconscious of enjoying them. Only when a sharp break comes in the calm and happiness of our lives do we awaken to that which we have all unconsciously possessed.

Would life be better, our burdens lighter, our sorrows be mitigated if God had tried to make clear to us why he permits pain and sin? We do not know. In the teaching of Him who came to make God known as Father, there is little or no attempt to explain the mysteries of life. Jesus nowhere philosophizes upon the origin of evil, but tells us how to overcome it. He does not tell us why death is, but gives full assurance that it is the door to life. He enters into no discussion of the nature of God and his reasons for creating the world as we know it, but quietly and constantly assumes the fatherliness of the Infinite Being. The implications of this great truth lead us far; not far enough to make all things clear, but far enough to bring confidence and comfort and strength. The child wonders why the mother does not stop the pain in the wounded finger, and cannot just understand why she who is seemingly omnipotent does not relieve. But the mother-love and the mother-comforting go far toward bringing relief. To know that God is our Father will not solve the insoluble problems of life, but it is of infinite value.

Conscious of our ignorance, face to face with the dead wall of mystery, what? Stoicism gives answer and tells us to be brave and strong. The epicurean philosophy would lead us to seize upon all sensual pleasures that we may deaden the pain of the heart. Jesus teaches that this life and these joys and sorrows are but a prelude to life as we shall find it when once the doors of death have closed behind us. Whether walking in the full sunlight or under skies dark with clouds, the way leads to a better country. If we will we may know a companionship which lightens every burden, soothes our pain and mitigates our sorrow. God is and he loves us. Some time we shall see clearly, and until that time comes we trust. Over against our ignorance and our questioning we place our certitude that, no matter what comes to us, we "cannot drift

Beyond His love and care."

Response to Two Inquiries

It is the earnest desire of The Christian Century to make plain to all its readers the exact position it holds with respect to Christian baptism, a subject upon which so sensitive a consciousness has been developed among Baptists and Disciples. A certain amount of repetition is necessary, we well know, if the immersion dogma is ever to be displaced by the true New Testament conception of baptism. We therefore take pleasure in responding to the following inquiries, without assenting for a moment to Mr. Richardson's self-depreciating characterization of his own intelligence as a true explanation of his failure to understand our meaning. The inquiries and our responses are as follows:

FROM REV. C. A. SWINNEY.

Editors Christian Century: Will you please give me your opinion in regard to the exclusive practice of immersion for baptism. I also want the full meaning of the Greek word baptizo. Any other information along these lines will be appreciated.

Pastor M. E. Church, South. C. A. SWINNEY.
Morgan, Texas.

1. The Christian Century believes in and advocates the exclusive practice of immersion in the administration of baptism for the following reasons:

(a) It is the historic mode by which the primitive church administered baptism.

(b) It is a singularly beautiful and appropriate symbol of the essential baptismal act.

(c) It is the one mode of administration upon which Christians of all sects can today conscientiously unite.

2. The root meaning of the Greek word baptizo, transliterated in our New Testament "baptize," is "immerse" or "dip" or an equivalent. In New Testament times and especially in Palestine the word had come to have a special or what the scholars call a "technical" meaning when used in referring to religious practice, just as its cognate word bapto had come to have a special or "technical" meaning in referring to the industry of dyeing, or the word psallo whose root meaning was "to pluck" (referring to the plucking of the strings of the lyre) had come to have the special or "technical" meaning "to sing." The special or "technical" meaning of baptizo was to induct or initiate one into a religious order. It is in this sense that the word is regularly used in the New Testament, save for the few instances in which its connotation is obviously non-religious. Those who argue that baptizo as used in the New Testament always means "immerse" and those who argue that it sometimes means "sprinkle" are equally in error. The word as characteristically used in the New Testament never means "immerse" and never means "sprinkle." As to the historical mode of administering baptism we believe the Baptist contention is right, namely that New Testament baptisms were solemnized by immersion in water and not by sprinkling. As to the claim that immersion and baptism are equivalent terms we believe the Baptist contention is wrong and that a translation of the Greek word by "immerse" not only robs the scripture texts in which the word occurs of their ethical and spiritual meaning but makes them unintelligible.

FROM REV. W. F. RICHARDSON.

Dear Brother Morrison: I have read with interest your editorial in The Christian Century of Sept. 12, entitled, "A Very Important Distinction." Some of its statements are to me simply incomprehensible. May I ask you a few questions, in order that, if possible, I may get at your thought?

You say, "In our view the immersion of a penitent believer in water, in obedience to Christ's command, is not Christian baptism. Christian baptism is the induction of such a penitent believer into the Church of Christ, and is administered by the authority of Christ."

1. "Please tell me what "the immersion of a penitent believer in water, in obedience to Christ's command, is then, if it is not baptism.

2. Where did Christ command it, if not in those scriptures relating to baptism?

3. And what is the baptism which "inducts the penitent believer into the Church of Christ," and what is done by the minister when such baptism is "administered by the authority of Christ?"

I confess to any degree of mental obtuseness you may charge against me, but I cannot understand what you mean, try as I may. Be patient with me, and make another effort to express your meaning so that the simple-minded among your brethren may get at your thought on this question. Fraternally yours,

First Church, Kansas City. W. F. RICHARDSON.

1. Assuming for the moment that Christ did command penitent believers to be immersed in water the only thing that can possibly be affirmed of such an act is that it is an immersion in water—a physical act. The fact that it is performed by a penitent believer does not make it any the less a physical act, nor does the fact that it is performed in obedience to Christ make it any the less a physical act. Of course, if the word "baptism" as used in the New Testament means immersion in water there can be no dispute that the New Testament commands penitent believers to perform this physical act and makes it a condition of pardon. But The Christian Century denies that "baptism" as used in the New Testament means immersion in water; denies that it means the immersion of a penitent believer in water; denies that it means the immersion of a penitent believer in water in obedience to Christ's command. We affirm that baptism means induction, or initiation, that it means the induction or initiation of a penitent believer into the Church of Christ, that it means the induction or initiation of a penitent believer into the Church of Christ by the authority of Christ.

2. The second question assumes that The Christian Century admits that Christ commanded immersion. This erroneous assumption is due to Mr. Richardson's overlooking the fact that our negative statement which he quotes is a condensed quotation (except for the "not") from the Christian Evangelist whose affirmation that "immersion in water of a penitent believer, in obedience to Christ's command, is Christian baptism," we were trying to controvert as squarely as words would allow.

3. There is no such thing as a "baptism which inducts the penitent believer into the Church of Christ." This way of putting it assumes that baptism is one thing and the induction another. But baptism is itself the induction.

When the minister administers baptism he inducts or initiates the properly qualified candidate into the Church of Christ, he confers upon him the status of a Christian. This he does not as a mere individual nor by his own authority, but as a representative of Christ and of the Church of Christ whose members were commissioned by the Lord himself to do just that thing. But this social act of inducting the candidate into the Church of Christ can be performed, like every other similar social act, only by the use of some physical objective sign or form. This objective sign might historically have been any one of many physical acts. In the modern church many ministers sprinkle water on the candidate's head. In the early church the ministers immersed the candidate in water. For the reasons given in reply to Rev. Mr. Swinney above we believe that it is desirable for baptism to be solemnized by immersion only.

But whether the minister uses sprinkling or immersion as the outward physical sign, the essential thing done is a spiritual thing, namely, the incorporation of the penitent believer into the social body of Christ.

Missionary Enterprise

The United Presbyterian Church is sending twenty-one young men and women to Egypt and India under the direction of their foreign board. As their faces look out upon us from the pages of their denominational paper, what a contrast they present to the appearance of the missionary of the past generation! These were beyond all question as noble a race of men and women as ever lived; their consecration and devotion are the miracles of the past century. But the present-day missionaries are permitted to face their new task with a larger vision of the field, and with a conception of missionary work of which their grandfathers did not conceive. If United Presbyterianism can do as much for the young people of the lands to which these workers go as it has done for the workers themselves there is no doubt that the Kingdom of Christ will be forwarded.

The Making of a Nation

A Challenge to Christian Men

By Arthur Holmes

Nineteen centuries ago the Occident appealed to the Orient, a continent challenged the church. The cry came from one lone man. Its burden was "Come over and help us." The answer to that one lone call coming like a vision of the night, inaugurated a westward moving campaign that has encircled the world with Christian churches.

Today a new challenge rings in the ears of America's hosts. It comes from a million throats. It is no far-cry from an unknown land but rises from the thresholds of our doors. It arises as an inarticulate babel with one common note, the burden "We have come over; help us." It comes from the foreign-born men, women and children in our land. By the mercies of God, they have foregathered from the corners of the earth, from the tribes, peoples, tongues and nations of the Apocalypse, and they are here. They answer "Present" in all the strident interrogations of industrial, social, moral and religious activities of our restless progress. Behind them stretches a long line of their fathers, mothers, wives, hubands, sweethearts, uncles, cousins and aunts, all with their expectant eyes turned toward this land of golden promise. With them America must yet deal. What it will do in the future depends upon what it does now. The host of the foreigner is here; their army is encamped; our country is invested; behind this army stretches an endless line of reserves. Something must be done with them. Their voice is a roar; their presence is a pregnant fact; their future is a staring problem with the question mark after the so-called Americans.

An Opportunity of an Epoch.

To the church these people offer the opportunity of an epoch. They challenge directly all the powers and all the methods of te people of God. The godless fearful look upon them as some frightful monster which will either devour or be devoured. The extreme religionist looks upon them as subjects of salvation. Neither is right. They are not subjects of salvation, nor yet of assimilation. The task is not to make them Americans but to fuse together the home-born and the foreignborn into one new nation, a singular people called the citizens of the Kingdom of God, brethren who live together in amity with equal rights and privileges.

Church Has Not Yet Begun Work.

Plain as this duty is, the Church, as well as other philanthropic institutions, has not, so far, made more than sporadic and initial experiments with it. Work, and splendid work, on a small scale has been done. Probably the Y. M. C. A. through its Industrial Department has developed the most comprehensive plan of industrial care-taking for the immigrant. From the time he leaves his foreign home until he arrives in his new place of abode he is kept in touch with some helpful agency. At Ellis Island, the church missionary meets him with tracts, Bibles, clothes and friendly advice. About twenty-five denominations are represented in the work. From them he goes to his new home. There he may find the Y. M. C. A. More likely he finds a countryman who pilots him to his Ghetto, to his Little Italy, his Over-the-Rhine, or other place of segregation in democratic America. Once there, he is walled-in by the indifference of his chosen compatriots and comes in contact with his adopted country only through periodic visits of the ward politician, through the local saloon, the exploiting contractor and possibly the local city missionary. All else is as foreign to America and as perfectly home-like to him as the traditions and the customs of his native village where his forefathers lived and died for generations past. By Americans he is let severely alone, half-feared, half-hated, wholly misunderstood, the victim of interminable petty wrongs, anxious to learn, groping toward the light and pathetically brave in his adherence to his early ideal of America "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

The Public School.

If all, or nearly all doors, except those of the corner saloon, are closed to him, one is wide-open to his children. Upon the overburdened public school falls nearly the whole task of "assimilating" the foreigner. Happily the door of the free school swings inward to all alike. With what avidity the foreigners are seizing upon this opportunity is shown by the statistics of thirty-seven cities, in which 1,048,490 children, or 57.8 per cent of all scholars, were of foreign born parentage, against 766,727 or 42.2 per cent of native parentage. Seventeen per cent are Hebrews, ancient lovers of learning and newly emancipated Russian serfs; 11 per cent are Germans; and 6 per cent Italians. They come largely from the homes wherein, out of 290,550 persons investigated, 17 per cent can read and write; where 5.81 persons live in each house or apartment with 1.38 to a room as against 4.2 natives in a household and only 82. in a room; and where, out of 145,-354 married men, 22.7 per cent or nearly one-quarter, have left their wives on the other side of the sea. Naked facts stripped, as they are of the poverty, squalor, misery and vice that such conditions are known to harbor, to are but deaf and dumb messengers of of the awful truth they hide. The slum-saloon, the ward-politican, the public school, and the pitiably, O, so pitiably, inadequate, but personally heroic city-missionary, know these conditions first-hand and either callously look on or shudderingly pray for the future of the Republic. To the rest of us the truth comes like a rumor under the sea.

Public Schools Fail.

Shall the public school be the only agency for the making of a new nation of these heterogeneous elements? Can it perform the task? Can its billion dollar material equipment, its $403,000,000 annual appropriation, its 500,-000 teachers, its long history of enviable achievement, its 18,000,000 pupils, can these fail in anything? They can and do fail. Our school-system has not only sharp limitations but vital defects.

Out of the 25,000,000 boys and girls in America between the ages of five and eighteen, only 18,000,000 are enrolled in school at all and one-third of these are absent all the time, and all of them are out of school 214 days out of 365 or five-eighths of the whole year. But this is not all. Of the 18,000,000 children 33.7 per cent, or over one-third, are one year or more behind the grades they should be in for their age. This means that about one-third of our boys and girls will never complete their common school course; for, the retarded ones are just the ones who leave school as soon as the legal age for working is reached. No wonder that over 1,500,000 or about 10 per cent of our voters in America are illiterate.

Religious Instruction Eliminated.

These limitations and defects are climaxed by the final one that religious instruction, for certain well-known reasons, is eliminated from our schools. Along with it has gone definite, systematic moral instruction. The results are to be seen in the increase of juvenile criminality faster than the increase in population. The divorce evil is appalling. Twenty-nine thousand and twenty courts in America are handling down divorces to one in England, twenty-eight in Germany and twenty-nine in France. About one-tenth of all American marriages end in the divorce court. Eight to ten thousand homicides are committed yearly. Only 2 per cent of the slayers are punished as compared with 90 per cent in Germany. Eleven thousand people annually, wearied with the battle of life, give up and commit suicide. Seventy-six per cent of our 500,000 school teachers are women and cannot, by the nature of the case, set the strong ideals for boys that should be set. Ninety per cent of our boys satisfy school conditions without ever being under a man. Under these circumstances how can anyone expect the public school to achieve the still more gigantic task of assimilating the foreign born children, to say nothing of the foreign-born men and women of our land? How can the heart of character-making be cut out of an institution and strong men and women still hope to come from that institution? Will not the church, the Disciples of Christ, the organized Brotherhood of Disciples, face this problem once and for all the readiest, ripest, most urgent concrete work to be done in America for the extension of God's Kingdom? Notice how this task fits the organization and spirit of our Disciple Brotherhood.

Distinctive and Inclusive.

It is distinctive and yet inclusive. It is for foreign born and yet for all Americans and for all America. It is the mingling of the elements, the mixing of mortar out of which will be moulded the solid concrete of a new nation.

It is an unappropriated field for our Brotherhood. No other organizations encumber the ground and crowd each other for space. It is practically virgin soil, an unclaimed foreign-home missionary field, ripe unto the harvest with the promise of richest visible returns.

It is a concrete task yet a part of the kingdom extension movement. No organization can transmute the roughened material of a Pollock into the finished product of an intelligent American citizen, no man can strike hands with a Russian Jew and call him "Brother" without promoting in the land and heart of America the Kingdom Come for which we pray. The task is at once as touchingly human as a human heart and as sublime as a universal and eternal ideal.

A Man's Work.

The work to be done is a man's work. Dutch, Jews, Dagoes, Pollocks, Slavs and Chinks are not lady-like, pink-tea, lavender-gloved gentlemen with lace handkerchiefs initialed by ladies of the congregation. They are rough, crude, grimy, unwashed and smelly; full of strange oaths and sudden passions. It takes a man with a crow-bar and drill and several sticks of dynamite to get down near enough to hear the rough fellows big heart beat. But his heart is there, and a soul, and a love surpassing, and possibilities infinite.

In every form of the human,

Some hint of the highest dwells,
And scanning each earthen vessel
In the place where the veil is thin,
We catch in beautiful glimpses,
Some form of the God within.

It is a man's work because it is chiefly for men. Besides the twenty-three out of every 100 married foreigners wifeless in America, thousands of unmarried men swarm in our industries and crowd our cities, untouched by the Y. M. C. A.'s, by the missions or any other uplifting agency. These are those who crowd twenty-eight in a two-story house, or fill the barrack-bunks of contractors, or sleep turn-about on floor mattresses, eat anywhere and find recreation only in the saloon and brothel. When these men marry the children's clinics and children's institutions of America write down an awful indictment against the country that, by neglect the ignorant fathers of its future citizens to live like dumb brutes.

Lastly, the task is big enough. It expands a man's lungs; makes him take a deep breath; and run his eye over its heroic dimensions. It naturally attracts big men. Charles R. Towson, of the International Committee Y. M. C. A. has sent John sumner and his American wife over thousands of miles of land and sea to trace the immigrant to his home; Professor Steiner, Professor of Applied Christianity, has trailed him across the sea twenty times or more; Dr. Peter Roberts, a man miner born and universally bred, has turned his mind to teaching immigrants English; Professor Jenks, a foremost sociologist, has given up his position with Cornell University to teach in New York University so as to be nearer Ellis Island. These wide-eyed men have seen the vision and are willing to give their lives to the work. It draws out the mind by the illimitable reach of its present effects and future influences. It is a task commensurate with nation-making in China, with civic and political regeneration in America, with empire-building by explorers, pioneers and missionaries. Yea, may we reverently say it? it partakes of something of that divine character manifested in the grand climacteric of creation when Jehovah said, "Let us make man in our image." In a new and peculiar sense the organized men of the Disciples of Christ can become co-workers with God in a new creational enterprise—the making of a new nation out of the blood and brawn and brain of many peoples.

The Latest Word From Congo-Land

By Stephen J. Corey

This is primeval country. Within a few hundred yards of the Longa mission buildings the jungle is almost impenetrable except for the few native paths. Elephants come at night and trample the gardens quite frequently and monkeys abound in the forest. It is wonderful what has been done here in the brief time the station has been opened. From a dense jungle has emerged a beautiful station with palms, foliage, shrubs, mangoes, bananas, plantain and pai pai trees everywhere. Two new brick missionary houses have been constructed. For the first few years Mr. Eldred and Doctor Jaggard lived in mud houses. A commodious mud chapel with whitewashed walls and wide palm leaf roof is crowded at church, school and Sunday-school time. The church here has 250 members. The people are reverent and the church well disciplined. Mr. Eldred is an all-round missionary. He has a large carpenter shop, a brick plant, a hand-power sawmill, a blacksmith shop and a dispensary, besides the church, day school in Lokundo and French and his evangelistic work. These African stations are certainly beehives of industry from five in the morning until late at night. Doctor Jaggard and wife go on to Monieka to take charge of that wonderful new station as the first resident missionaries. That is the most remarkable work we have here. Under the guidance of Tso, a strong native evangelist, and with the occasional visitation of a missionary it has grown to a membership of 500.

The Natives' Greeting.

It was a great joy to meet the people here. It is a day's journey from Bolenge and as the steamer swung into the beach with its high bank, we saw the Christians lined up and heard them singing in the melodious Lokundo tongue "Follow, follow, I will follow Jesus." Mr. Eldred had taught the people a salutation in French so they all gave a salute and addressed me in unison "Monsieur Corey, vous etes bien venu."

We found Mr. and Mrs. Eldred quite well, but both looking somewhat worn and tired. On Sunday morning we baptized sixteen candidates most of them having come several days' journey from the back country with the evangelists. Four of them were from far up the Bolingo River, being some of the first-fruits of the work recently established among their people. Mr. Eldred and I hope to take a canoe trip to this region on our return from Monieka before I leave for America. Sunday was a delightful day. The church was filled at the morning service, the afternoon Sunday-school and the evening services where two evangelists were ordained. One of these preached the sermon in the morning. His subject was the "Parable of the Sower," and he stood barefooted before the large audience. His voice rang out with stirring fervor. The missionaries stated that the sermon was exceptionally strong and pointed. We can all learn from these preachers from the forest. They speak in a way that is natural and with ease and grace. I have heard a number of them preach who are not able to read, one of these a general evangelist over ten villages, and I have marveled at their liberty and their power over an audience. They seem to be born speakers. As rapidly as possible these men are being taught the rudiments of learning. They are all anxious to be taught, but it is quite hard for the older ones to learn. The missionaries have a good plan, however, of sending a school teacher who can read with each evangelist who cannot. These people have exceptional memories and the evangelists who cannot read are able to present the simple teaching of the gospel effectively after the missionaries have carefully instructed them.

Constant Interest.

There is something of interest taking place every hour out here. Yesterday a man came walking in a four days' journey just to see Doctor Jaggard and talk with him. The Doctor had operated on the man for elephantiasis (a large tumor) a few years ago, and he is perfectly well now. He went into ecstacies when he saw his benefactor and gave expression to his delight for at least ten minutes much as a child would do when greatly pleased. He was tall, graceful, with a kindly face, and was dressed in a fur cap and meager loin cloth. Doctor Jaggard had been talking to him but a few minutes when he began to ask him about his attitude toward the "Jesus teaching." The man replied that he was not a Christian but was going to be. Then he voiced his difficulty. He said he had two wives, they were both good to him and it was hard to give one up. This problem is very real to these people out here. Wives are property and about all the property a heathen man has. It is not only the question of giving up all the wives, in order to become a Christian, but the problem of the wives themselves who do not want to give up the man. Gradually, however, under the teachings of Christ, these men are keeping but one wife and coming to the new life in God.

Work to Grow in Importance.

This morning, early, a man and his wife came to see the "white chief" as the natives are pleased to call the writer. They had walked three days for the visit. The man was almost six feet tall and of splendid build. The wife was comely but elaborately marked with the tribal cuttings on face, body and arms. The man wore a loin cloth and the woman one of the curious little girdles with the raffia ponpon behind which is peculiar to this district.

A great district of villages lies contiguous to Longa. The work here is bound to grow in importance as the years go by. Radiating from here are the Ruki, Bosira, Mombayo and Bolingo Rivers, all splendid water ways and leading to a great population. A medical missionary is sadly needed here and when he comes a hospital must be built for him. Many of the bricks are already burned for it. No one can measure the marvelous opportunities for such a worker. The canoes would bring patients from all directions and this kindly service would open up many centers for the preaching of the gospel.

Tomorrow the steamer goes on to Lotumbe where we have a conference of all the missionaries. Herbert Smith and wife are located there.

Longa, Africa.

"Before a Christian in his right mind can borrow trouble he must forget that God has promised to never leave him nor forsake him."

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

When Mrs. Douglas had finally fallen asleep Helen still remained broad awake. Things had been said in the heart talk that made it impossible for her to compose herself to sleep. She could no longer doubt the truthfulness of Bauer or his clear motive, and strange tumult arose in her thought over the statement her mother had made about his abandonment of any thought of her as her suitor. The fact that he had expressed such a sentiment to her mother made Helen a little angry. Why should he give up all hope so easily—why—what was she thinking? She said to herself she did not want men to be cowards, but surely Felix Bauer was not a coward. A man who would go over a cliff like that did not deserve to have a timid girl like her call him a coward. Only——

And in the midst of all her other feelings she could not altogether shut out the sight of Van Shaw, broken and bruised as he had lain in agony there on the seat in the little chapel and she could not, even after all her mother had said, quite dismiss him from her thought. Her cheek glowed as she raised the question in her imagination of money and its fascinating power. Were all young men of wealth like Van Shaw? Would it never be possible for her to marry wealth and virtue together? And again there was that strange commingling of shame and exultation as she realised what a power she possessed to attract even such a one as Van Shaw, and try as hard as she would she did not drive out the scene of his declaration that morning. At any rate, it was genuine. Let him be what he had been, might she not awaken all the latent good in his nature and save him—her mother's ideas were very strict and serious. They were perhaps puritanical. But after all——

So she restlessly went back and forth in her argument and only fell asleep towards morning, her heart and mind wearied with the whole thing. Before she fell asleep she resolved to have a talk with Miss Gray and make her tell what she knew. She said to herself she would at least not dismiss Van Shaw entirely until she knew even more than her mother had been able to tell her about him.

But before the opportunity came for Miss Gray's confidence, several unexpected events occurred that made Helen wonder if she were in a land of enchantment.

After what had already become a part of her history in this strange land, she might be pardoned, if, with her highly romantic temperament, she felt excited to an unusual degree.

In the first place, Mr. Masters had word that next morning after the snake dance, that he was needed imperatively at Tolchaco on account ofthe illness of Ansa, old Begwoettins' grandchild. This was Miss Gray's favourite, and she was eager to return to the mission with Mr. and Mrs. Masters as soon as possible. Accordingly the fastest team and the lightest outfit were pressed into service and a short time after breakfast Mr. and Mrs. Masters and Miss Gray were ready to take the road by the Oraibi Wash, hoping to make Tolchaco by the next afternoon. Elijah Clifford wanted to go but it seemed necessary for him to remain with Mr. and Mrs. Douglas and help pack up for the return trip. Besides, two of the chuck wagon teams had broken their hobbles in the night and wandered off into the "indefinite nowhere" as Clifford said, and until they were found and brought back, it was impossible for the rest of the party to hitch in and leave Oraibi.

As if providence had come to the special help of Walter, just before Masters had finished his preparations to leave, the Navajo runner who had brought word of Ansa's illness went silently to Walter and handed him a letter that had reached Tolchaco post-office the day the runner started. It had a special delivery stamp on it to indicate the desire of the sender for haste, and after reading, Walter rushed over to his father who was helping Masters hitch up the traces.

"Listen to this, father!" he said in great excitement, while Mrs. Masters and Miss Gray were getting into the wagon and saying good-bye to Mrs. Douglas and Helen. "Anderson writes that Blake, the assistant foreman, is sick, and if I can come on and help him work over the installation of those new Reimark dynamos before term opens, he can promise me a good place as second assistant in the coil room this winter. I know more about the Reimark than Anderson himself and it will be a fine chance for me. He says I can have full pay for summer term work. I shall have to start back to Burrton by the first, anyway, and if Mr. Masters can take me along now, I can get over to Canon Diablo or Winslow in time to make the California express and get into Burrton next week."

Masters gave a quick consent.

"We can take four as well as three. Come on."

Walter rushed his few camp things into his suit-case, stowed it under his seat, kissed his mother and Helen, shook hands with Bauer, who was able to sit up on his cot in the near-by tent, and climbed into the wagon by the side of Mr. Masters.

Elijah Clifford was not present when all this occurred, and when he came into camp two hours later trailing the fugitive horses after him, Master's wagon was a black speck down by the Oraibi Wash.

Bauer told him of Walter's unexpected return to Tolchaco with Mr. Masters and Miss Gray.

"Yes, I told you," said Clifford. And for a moment Bauer thought he could detect a note of pensive regret in his words. "I told you Walter was lost. It's wonderful what providences there are for some people. That professor in that school couldn't have figured on getting that letter here at a more real serviceable opportunity for Walter, if he had been a real first-class magician. And did you say there was a special delivery stamp on the letter? That beats everything worse than nothing. That's the first time, I reckon, in five hundred years that a special delivery stamp was ever used on a Tolchaco letter. And just think of the way things cogged into the right openings to get that letter there by special messenger. Well, well, I wouldn't mind being in Walter's place myself if I didn't feel so necessary here. But Mr. Douglas can't drive these mustangs back to Tolchaco."

He winked at Bauer good-naturedly and hastened to inquire into his condition.

"I'm black and blue," said Bauer, "but otherwise sehr gut. This is a miraculous climate. My hemorrhage is slight, and I don't believe it will recur. I have no symptoms. I don't want you to delay the return on my account." Then he added after a pause, "How is Van Shaw?"

"That fellow," said Elijah, "has missed breaking his neck by a miracle. His collar-bone was fractured clear up to the last bone in his spinal column. Both of his legs were broken below the knee. He must have struck right on his toes when he fell, and doubled up on himself. He can't move out of here for some while. But I understand his mother has sent a wire from Winslow for Mr. Van Shaw to come on from Pittsburg. She is pretty well upset by the whole business. She tried to thank me for saving her son's life and I think she was too hysterical and excited to understand me when I told her you were the party. She hinted that her husband would probably deed a railroad or two to me for saving her precious son's life. If they send the railroad out here, I'll turn it over to you. I don't want it."

"But you did save him," said Bauer with some feeling.

"Well, no, I reckon I just preserved him. You had him saved, and I just took what you handed over and passed it up. But what were you doing out there on the edge of that rock last night, anyhow? I forgot to ask when I was down there on the ledge and never thought of it again until just now."

Bauer was spared the embarrassment of trying to satisfy Clifford's good-natured curiosity by the arrival into the tent of Mrs. Douglas, accompanied by the tourist doctor who had offered his services to both Bauer and Van Shaw and had fortunately had enough of his repair kit with him to do all that could be done outside of a well-appointed hospital.

He pronounced Bauer to be in good condition and anticipated no recurrence of the flow for him if he were careful. Van Shaw was in a more serious case. He was suffering from a nervous shock and would have to stay where he was for some time. A room had been hired in a small stone house belonging to the government farmer, and Van Shaw was as comfortable as he could be under the circumstances. But he was delirious a part of the time and the doctor evidently believed his condition to be serious, if not critical.

Helen received the news of all this from her mother when she came back from Bauer's tent. She was much shocked at the account Mrs. Douglas gave. And again, as during the night, she found herself dwelling more over Van Shaw's suffering than Bauer's heroism.

The doctor advised two days' rest for Bauer before starting back to Tolchaco, so Clifford delayed the preparations for their start and during that time Talavenka came to see Helen, and Helen, with her accustomed enthusiasm, suggested to her in Esther's presence a plan for going East and completing her education.

Talavenka listened with perfect equanimity to Helen's glowing account of the opportunities for education in the Girls' School at Milton. Then she said with more than a quiet manner—it was a poise of all the faculties—that a white person seldom possesses:

"You are kind, but I ought to stay here with my mother for a while. She needs me."

"But would she not be willing to have you go away for a little while just to gain more power for your people? Mother, would you be willing to have Talavenka stay with us this winter?"

"I have already talked with your father and Mr. and Mrs. Masters about Talavenka and we are ready to take her into our home and treat her like one of our own circle," said Esther, who was chairman of the missionary committee in her church and a great enthusiast in all forms of missionary work.

Talavenka turned her black eyes to Mrs. Douglas. Her face shone. The light of her Christian faith illuminated her countenance like a gleam of sunshine. It was so marked that both Mrs. Douglas and Helen were startled by it.

"I do not know how to thank you. But my mother needs me this winter. I must stay with her."

She said it so gently, with such a complete sense of joyousness and an absence of all thought of renunciation, that Helen was profoundly moved. There was no possibility of changing her mind or insisting. There was something about Talavenka's simple statement that was distinctly final.

When the girl rose to go, Helen noticed the reddish brown water jar that Talavenka had dropped by the tent opening when she had entered.

"Yes," she said, as she put the jar on her back after passing the cord through the ears of it, "I am going down to the spring. How glad I am to be so well. Jesus helps me to bear all things."

She went out and half an hour later Helen, lying on her cot outside the tent, saw her again coming up the trail with the swinging trot peculiar to the Hopi women, the full jar on her back, and she was singing, not the old song that her mother still sung, but a Christian hymn, "A little talk with Jesus makes it right, all right."

Helen watched her until she vanished behind the first cluster of grey houses. Talavenka had gone back to her people for a while. But her torch was aflame, the torch of that faith that is destined in time to kindle the grey rock of Oraibi into a beacon of illumination that shall give healing and salvation to all those darkened minds and make the desert to blossom like the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley.

The second day Elijah, Clifford, and Paul began to pack up, ready to break camp the following morning and start back to Oraibi. Van Shaw's condition was not much changed except that he was more rational. This was a hopeful symptom and the doctor made the most of it, encouraging Mrs. Van Shaw all he could.

Mr. Van Shaw was expected the next day, coming from Winslow. Van Shaw's friends, after learning that there was nothing special for them to do, had already made their plans to leave when the Tolchaco party went, going in company with Clifford.

Helen was nervous and unhappy. She had begun to brood over matters. Her mother had not said any more after that night's talk, but she could easily see that Helen was still going over the same ground, and that the chapter had not yet been closed for her. The thought gave Esther much uneasiness and yet she thought it unwise to open the subject again and so maintained a discreet silence, trusting to absence from the scene and the return to Milton to do what only time could effect in the girl's mind.

It lacked an hour or two of the time for departure the next morning when Mrs. Van Shaw came over to the camp with marks of trouble in her looks as she came into the tent where Mrs. Douglas and Helen were sitting. Mrs. Douglas was an energetic camper and had completed her packing early and was ready for the wagons as soon as the horses had been hitched in.

Mrs. Van Shaw was a showy woman who had done her best to spoil her son ever since his birth, by giving him everything he wanted, simply because he asked for it.

On this occasion she came at once to the point of her errand.

"Mrs. Douglas, my boy wants to see Miss Douglas before you go. He says he wants to say something to her in our presence. He has been begging me to come and see you all the morning. Can you come over now before you leave?"

Helen sat up a little higher on her cot, and her cheeks flamed. Mrs. Douglas looked at her, hesitated, and then answered Mrs. Van Shaw.

CHAPTER XVII.

"What does your son want to say to my daughter?" asked Esther. The thought of a dramatic interview between them was exceedingly distasteful to her.

"I don't know," said Mrs. Van Shaw guardedly. "He has been begging me to come and see you. Oh, he is very ill!" and at that the mother in her, mistaken and distorted though it were, in her training of the boy, broke down and she began to sob.

Esther was moved at the sight, and after a moment she said gently, "We are all so sorry for you, Mrs. Van Shaw. The shock of it all must have been terrible for you."

"I am just about prostrated by it. Mr. Van Shaw is expected today. He was in New York when the news reached him. But it surely is not asking anything improper to ask Miss Douglas to see my boy before you leave. We shall be obliged to remain here in this dreadful place until the doctor says Ross can be moved."

"Will you see him?" asked Esther, turning to Helen, and speaking quietly.

"Yes, I am willing to go," replied Helen in a very low voice. She dreaded and at the same time courted the interview. It had just the tinge of dramatic setting in it that appealed to her highly romantic imagination. She did not know what he wanted to say to her and she was not in the least prepared for the interview. But it seemed to her that it would be a piece of foolish affectation to refuse his request and especially since she would in all probability not have any occasion to meet him again.

Esther went out of the tent and in a few words told Paul of Mrs. Van Shaw's visit and its object. Helen would have to be carried over to the government farmer's house. Clifford called up two of the Indians and with their help he and Paul carried Helen over. Bauer, who was hardly yet fit to sit up, but had already climbed into his place in one of the chuck wagons, saw the whole thing from where he sat, and again his mind went into a whirl with jealousy and anger. If Helen's mother had told her of Van Shaw's character, how could the girl, in spite of all that, go and see him now? It seemed to him like an indication of something coarse and low in Helen's nature, something which contradicted his pure thought of her. He could not understand it, and being ignorant of the fact that Helen was going in response to Mrs. Van Shaw's request, he brooded miserably over the whole affair and sat there gazing gloomily at the little stone house into which the group with Helen had gone.

Paul and Clifford and the Indians soon came out and went on completing their preparations for the departure.

Meanwhile, in the little room where Ross Van Shaw lay, tortured in mind and body, a remarkable scene was being enacted.

There was just room close by the door for the cot on which Helen was sitting, and the moment she was placed there, she was aware of Van Shaw's face staring at her. The sight of it shocked her almost to the verge of hysterics. She instantly controlled herself as she quickly noted the fact that both her mother and Mrs. Van Shaw were watching her.

"I wanted to see you before you went away," Van Shaw was saying, and his voice sounded very weak and a long ways off to Helen as she saw the tremble of his hands and the uncertain glance he cast at her, so sharply different from his previous bold and positive attitude towards her.

"We are so sorry for you," said Helen. "It was a miracle you were not killed."

"Yes. Thanks to Mr. Clifford, mother tells me. I want to thank him before he goes. Mother, won't you ask him to come in?"

"Yes, Ross. But do you think you can bear all this excitement? I am afraid it will be too much for you." The government farmer's wife, who was acting as nurse, added a word of objection.

"No, it won't," he said irritably. "I want to see him. Didn't you tell me he saved my life? I ought at least to thank him for it."

"I'll tell him, yes I will!" Mrs. Van Shaw spoke in the hurried, anxious tone of one who feared a scene if she refused his request.

"Tell him now then, mother. Ask him to come in now."

"I will. I will." Mrs. Van Shaw rose and went out of the room, leaving Mrs. Douglas and Helen staring at Van Shaw and wondering how he had not heard the news of his rescue by Bauer.

Van Shaw turned his look again towards Helen. And she saw then, even in her agitation, that he was moved by the excitement of his fever. As a matter of fact, the doctor when he came the next day was in a towering rage with Mrs. Van Shaw over what he called her insane yielding to the request of a delirious patient.

"I wanted to see you, Miss Douglas, before you went and warn you about that German fellow Bauer. He's been telling you stories about me, and trying to butt into my affairs and I just won't stand for it. You ought to know that his father and mother are in disgrace over a great scandal—"

Esther could not bear any more. She stood up and started to speak just as Mrs. Van Shaw came hurrying in with Elijah Clifford. Helen was looking at Van Shaw with a different look from that which she had given him when she entered. It seemed as if a veil had been suddenly torn away from the girl's face and she was seeing something clearly which she had seen only dimly heretofore.

Before Esther could say what was on her lips, Van Shaw had gone on. But it was evident to all of them now that he was becoming delirious.

"Bauer hasn't any business to butt into my affairs. He's a sneaking cur. I won't stand for it. I'll get even with him. I'll tell Miss Douglass about his family. She'll never look at him again after that. I'll cook his job."

Mrs. Van Shaw looked uncertainly from one face to another.

"Here's Mr. Clifford, Ross. You wanted to see him."

THE PRESSING NEED OF A PEACEFUL MIND

By Helen Dare.

I wonder how many wives who are secretly—or vociferously—disappointed in husbands who didn't "get on" in life as they expected them to, or as their youthful promise misled them into believing they would, realize how much they contributed to the failure.

I wonder how many of them, in their accusing regrets and bitter, reluctant resignation, know that they clipped the wings and weighted the feet, that set out to attain the heights.

A little word that Kubelik said the other day in beautiful tribute to his wife has, somehow, singled her out. and pointed the finger of accusation at the host of unhappy, discontented, thwarted wives who have not her wisdom—and her sympathetic understanding and devotion.

Kubelik—gifted master of the violin, that slight, vivid figure that, with a wooden box and a strand of strings on his arm, can occupy a big, barren stage alone, and thrill and hold a vast gathering of his fellow beings—Kubelik, who, on his farewell night in New York two years ago, by one little returning step upon the stage, brought more than three thousand shuffling, departing hearers to a pause and perfect silence, when, by one step, he indicated his willingness to give them a final encore number for good measure, and kept them there entranced with listening to him the while they were missing their boats and trains and reserved supper tables; Kubelik said in answer to the pleasant comment on his health and energy and sane, serene poise:

"I have my dear wife to thank for all that. She knows so well how to keep me happy with the peaceful mind for my work."

Only the eager, impassioned toiler, striving toward the attainment of an ideal, can quite fully understand the Kubelik tribute, and the pressing need of a peaceful mind to one who would give of his best in achievement.

A man can't go to his work—whether it be the building of a great poem or a brick wall—and do his best with his mind disturbed by his wife's complaining or wrangling or fault-finding.

He can't go from a turbulent meal in a disordered household, torn by contention, nerve-shattered by a "scene" that has given vent for the discharge of feminine hysteria and do his best in painting a picture or carrying through a deal, in selling neckties or running an engine.

He can't waste his energy in reassuring an emotionally-exacting woman that he loves but her and never loved another, and explaining away from her jealous mind all suspicious circumstances, and yet have enough left to command the composure and concentration necessary for creative work—even when it is no more than the creation of a new style lapel in a tailor shop.

A man can't get out in the full vigor that he needs to hold his own with rival workers in a man's world when his mind is disturbed and his digestion upset by an angry woman who threatens to go home to mother, or burn down the house, or turn on the gas if he does this or doesn't do that she tries to force him to do to test his love for her, or her puny power over him.

Some men can't be honest—and retain the peaceful mind of the unafraid to do the humdrum daily task as it should be done—because of wives who weep and pout, and nag and taunt because they have not all the money they want for the automobiles and theater tickets, the unimportant, superfluous, burdensome things that money can buy.

The first requisite of the worker, whether he be artist or laborer, leader or subordinate, is the peaceful mind—the deck cleared for action, as it were.

If only wives knew!

Suppose Xantippe had known?

Or Bulwer Lytton's fretful, flighty wife?

Or the poor, misguided, harried woman, proud, distainful and deficient in sympathy, who was Abraham Lincoln's wife?

And if they knew would they submerge their own individuality, suppress their own ego so far as to try to learn how to keep a man "happy and with the peaceful mind for work," merely because they had happened to be married to the man?

This is not a self-effacing age for women.

Nearly every woman—unless she is a hopelessly supine, old-fashioned woman, unaware of her rights and the possibilities of modern independence—feels herself entitled to a "career" of some sort.

She's bent on cutting some ice herself more than on helping some man, from her obscure place in his shadow, to do the cutting.

It is pretty hard to find women who are willing to be the kind of a wife Mrs. Gladstone was—doing with her own hands and out of her own devotion all the little necessary services that saved him from the friction of life, and conserved his powers in their freshness for his chosen work.

Mrs. Gladstone wasn't in the least above coming with a bag with fresh linen when parliament was in session and Gladstone was to speak, and seeing to it that he was well prepared beforehand, and caught no cold from his ardor and a damp shirt after his speech.

She let him eat his breakfast in silence, without petulantly protesting that he no longer loved her because he so neglected her at table, secure in her knowledge that he sometimes needed opportunity for meditation.

Mrs. Thomas Edison could have got a divorce in any easy court long ago for "cruelty and neglect," "mental anguish," or any of those fanciful charges, if she'd been of the mind to, for it is a matter of anecdotal fact that Edison's domestic habits are shockingly irregular.

Lots of times he doesn't come to the meals that are so laboriously prepared for him; and "stays out nights"—in his laboratory.

But Mrs. Edison sort of sensed it that he might want to have a chance to invent things—and she lets him alone, slips in nourishment when she can manage it without disturbing him, and sees to it that he gets rest after his long vigils; and all this helps to give him "the peaceful mind" for his work.

The worker needs this sort of protecting care—especially the creative worker—in order to have the peaceful mind for work.

Balzac, prodigious producer that he was, had the fond protection of his cook, Auguste, who kept out bothersome visitors, brought him soup and set it where he would notice it without being distracted by it; and he had the comfort of the appreciative sympathy of Mme. Hanska—when she wrote to him and assured him of it.

But he couldn't get his mind on his work, try as he would, when she didn't write, or wrote disquieting letters.

Workers need the peaceful mind—even when they are women workers.

But where is the woman who can get the devotion a self-effacing wife gives a husband?

How many women striving for careers, endeavoring to give expression to talent, are so lucky as Patti, who was cherished by Nicolini?

Perhaps in this very want lies the explanation why so few women have achieved greatly.

When women no longer give this sacrificial service to men—as they may not if they are busy in careers of their own—how will it affect men?

Will they refuse to marry as self-protection?

How to Conquer Nervousness

Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus.

God bless anything that will save any of us from nervousness, and yet will give us more nerve. A brainstorm is not only a confession of cerebral anarchy. It is the absence of the player from the stringed instrument. Nerve enough to be steady is the exact opposite of nervousness enough to become the victim of one's own panic. Hysteria and the "blues" are not to be overcome by a retreat. They will depart with the onset which vigorous nerve assures of a victory from the start. Being religious in the wrong way—an inadequate religion—will not amend matters. Exhausted by success, once Elijah lacked nerve, but he was very nervous, even to hysteria and melancholy, when he was lodging in the cave, and before the Lord taught him in the still small voice. Not the greatest singer can interpret Mendelssohn's aria from "Elijah"—"It is enough; now, Lord, O, let me die" in any such way as to deliver from "that nervous feeling" as to human failure in the presence of great difficulties—a nervousness that has its root in faithlessness as to God's sovereign power.

How shall Elijah "get his nerve?" Not by ruminating on statistics as to whether he is the only man left who can help God in his crisis with the heathen. "I, only I, am left"—Nonsense! And it is egotism too. The nerves of a man are often spread over his skin, creating a self-consciousness which is horrible, and almost ridiculous. Nervous, but without nerve! Don't get too pietistic, and forget your body, O my soul! It is well to take into consideration the fact that Elijah needed something to eat. A square meal is a lively means of grace for such a man. But, even then, the crisis is a religious one. His religion must get him out of the cave; set him on his feet and start him toward the doing of duty. The voice comes and rouses his nerve into assured power. He soon sees the seven thousand who were left to fight with him—the comrades whom his blinding egotism hid in gloom from him.

The greatest treasure of character is educated will. But will does its business by and through nerve. Stonewall Jackson and Grant represent nerve. More brilliant was Albert Sidney Johnston, but at Shiloh he somehow got too far ahead of his valorous comrades. He was too far ahead even to lead them well. The battle of Shiloh perhaps was not so much gained by Grant and his nerve as it was lost by Albert Sidney Johnston and his nervousness, which separated him from the rank and file and cost his cause its Chevalier Bayard. By the way, once on a time, Bayard's horse became unmanageable on the battlefield of Marignano, and, leaping through the vines and into the morass, the panic-stricken beast exposed the mighty soldier to death. But your Bayard always reins up the steed called nervousness, and he rules him by nerve. He rode back to his cohorts and rallied them again for the fray. Nerve alone can ride nervousness, which, after having been conquered, becomes a fine sensitiveness to duty and delight. But once again nerve is not coarseness and egotism; it is the gentleness and graciousness of Bayard taming the runaway, and riding him to triumph.—From Chicago Record-Herald.

Cannot We All Be One?

We pray together, side by side,
On the happy Sabbath days.
We sing together, in unison,
The one great Father's praise.
We walk together about the earth,
And meet where the work is done;
What are the things that are parting us
Cannot we all be one?

Sometimes, instead of the songs of peace
There is heard the sound of a fight.
And fire is flashing from angry eyes
That are sure their heart is right.
And each declares, in a cause so just,
That he will yield to none.
Yet his brother is righteous and feels the same.
Cannot we all be one?

Oh, why should we of the Father's house
Be wasting our time and strength
In fighting each other when Wrong and Sin
Must be fought outright at length?
Why should our cleverest words all sting
Some hearts that are true as ours
Should the hands be Christian that sow the thorns
Where Christ would put the flowers?

Principle, Righteousness, Liberty;
Watchwords these of us all.
But when others take them we change their names,
And the same things errors call.
God forgive us! We have not yet
The spirit of Christ the Son,
Nor pray for ourselves as He prays for us,
'I would that they all be one!'

We do but need, for a deeper love,
That we know each other more.
Mistaking brothers for enemies
We have lost the right before.
But the world will not wholly become our Lord's,
Nor our Father's will be done,
Till the Church is living in perfect peace,
And the Christian hearts are one.

—The graduates of Princeton Seminary carry out the old Bible idea that the days of the righteous shall be many. The Necrological report of the seminary for the year 1912 has just been issued. Of the sixty-seven former students, the oldest, Rev. Robert A. Criswell, class of 1852, had reached the age of ninety-one years and nine months. Another had also passed his ninety-first year. Twelve others had passed their eightieth year, nineteen their seventieth, and fifteen their sixtieth. The youngest died at the age of twenty-eight years, one month, and nine days. The average age of the sixty-seven was sixty-five years and eight months. The average age at which they made a public confession of their faith was sixteen years and eleven months.

Dr. C. L. Pickett of Laoag, P. I., reports an encouraging record of converts at the mission there for the first six months of 1912, as follows: January 9, February 15, March 13, April 30, May 41, June 46.

"I am getting up a great big sermon out of that little suggestion of W. F. Richardson's which you printed in the last Century," writes an appreciative pastor referring to Mr. Richardson's "Steps to Life's Summit."

Clarence G. Baker has preached two years at Plymouth, Ind., while studying at the University of Chicago. He reports ninety-three additions to the church during that time. He will close his work there in October.

On the first Sunday after Robert Graham Frank returned home from his vacation to his church at Liberty, Mo., his congregation repaired to the dining-room after the morning service and gave him a home-coming dinner.

Twenty-six Russian Disciples in Chicago as the result of the labors of Basil S. Keusseff is the latest report of this misionary. He recently baptized three—two men and a boy. Two of the young men of this congregation have entered a training school to prepare for Christian work among their fellow countrymen.

W. S. Priest, of Central Church, Wichita, Kan., had the distinction of being invited for the third consecutive year to deliver the Labor Day address, which he did to 2,000 people in Riverside Park. He also was invited to give the opening address at Fairmount College—a Congregational institution. His theme was "Student Ideals.'

Texas Christian University was shocked last week at the news of the death of Mrs. Pearl Archer Kershner, wife of President F. D. Kershner of the university. Mrs. Kershner had submitted to a surgical operation and was thought to be rallying. She had made many friends in college and city circles in the short time since her husband's administration began.

C. G. Kindred of Englewood Church, Chicago, has been assisting W. B. Clemmer and the congregation at Rockford, Ill., in raising the final $1,800 on the initial $10,000 with which to begin their new house of worship. Both Mr. Kindred and Mr. Clemmer believe in raising the bulk of the money in advance. Englewood Church is erecting a $20,000 addition for Sunday-school purposes and the entire sum was provided before the contract was let.

The church at Greenfield, Ind., recently helped its pastor, B. F. Dailey, and wife, to celebrate their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary. They left at the parsonage about $10 worth of silver coin and tableware. This church is rejoicing over a new $3,000 pipe organ which was dedicated September 15. W. E. M. Hackleman is now assisting the pastor in a meeting which is adding substantially to the membership. Mr. Dailey is in his tenth years' work with this church.

The new church at Sciota, Ill., was dedicated Sunday, September 29, by Geo. L. Snively. It is built of brick, with Bedford stone trimming. It is a handsome, modern structure throughout; with main auditorium, Sunday-school rooms and choir annex upstirs, and large dining-room and kitchen in basement. C. A. Lockhart, a former minister, is deserving of a good deal of credit for urging the congregation to erect a new house of worship. The present minister, J. F. Smith, has served the congregation since last spring.

Dr. Willett's Departure.

Dr. and Mrs. H. L. Willett and party sailed from San Francisco last Friday on their tour of the oriental mission fields. Dr. Willett was kept busy for the three days he spent around San Francisco filling appointments in the churches. He was compelled to postpone his departure from Chicago nearly a week later than his earlier schedule called for and greatly to his regret had to cancel apointments made to speak in other churches enroute. Before leaving Chicago Dr. Willett declined to allow Memorial Church to consider him as pastor in absentia, insisting that he could not in good conscience ask for a holiday of such great length. He therefore left the church free to act in regard to their pastoral leader as they may see fit. Mr. Dakin, the associate minister, is now the sole minister and is pushing the work vigorously. The church people, however, decline to take Dr. Willett's resignation seriously and say that his absence is but a temporary suspension of his leadership.

A Typical Case.

The folowing item is being copied widely in the press of central Ilinois. Even though certain details of the report may be in error there is significance in the obvious fact upon which the whole is based: "Financially crippled, two Sidney churches, the Christian and the Presbyterian, have notified their pastors that they will be unable to retain them another year. Neither of the churches desire to hire another minister, at least for some time. This news comes as a bolt from the sky, as for years Sidney has supported two churches and to all appearances supported them well. The attendance at both has been dwindling, however, and the pastors have been forced to preach to empty pews night after night. Also it cannot be said that the fault lies with the ministers, for both of them are well liked in the community and are men of brains. Rev. Charles Adams has been the pastor of the Christian church for the past two years and has been a success, considering the conditions. Rev. E. M. Snook, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church, has been here about a year and has done his utmost to put the church in a prosperous condition."

Professor Fortune's Salutatory.

A. W. Fortune, who spent the past summer in a trip to Palestine, returned in time to take up his new duties as teacher in the College of the Bible at Lexington, Ky. Mr. Fortunt writes us as follows:

"I have entered upon my new work in the College of the Bible, and I am more than pleased with the outlook. I find in my classes a splendid group of young people, and their earnestness convinces me that they are here for a purpose.

"It was difficult to leave a ministry where the work was so absolutely harmonious as it was at Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, but when I entered the class room in the College of the Bible, the dream of years was realized. I came here because I had long felt that I could make my life count for most in helping to train young men for the ministry. Our age not only needs more ministers, but it needs better equipped ministers, and I count myself happy to have a little part in the training of the young men and women who come to this historic school.

"The minister is a religious leader, and I believe that those who would be religious leaders must first of all be genuine Christians. They must live in close touch with God before they can help others to know God. They are to build up the church, and hence they must believe in it; that it is a divine institution, established for the bringing in of God's eternal kingdom. They must believe in the dignity and power of the ministry; that those who have chosen this sacred calling, from the point of view of service, occupy a position which has no equal.

"Those who would be ministers among the Disciples must be in sympathy with the principles for which the Disciples stand, and believe that the promulgation of those principles is worthy of their best efforts. They must believe in the Word of God, for this is our rule of faith and practice. They must not only believe that God spoke through the holy men or old, but they must also believe that through those men God is speaking to the men of our day. Those who would be ministers among the Disciples must believe in Jesus the Divine Savior, for Christ will be the center of their message, and their highest aim will be to help men and women to know Christ and to live in fellowship with him. They must be in touch with the great movements of the past and present, and from these be able to interpret God to men.

"Thus believing in the minister and in his equipment for service, it is a privilege to have a part in this great work for which the College of the Bible stands."

Right you are, Brother Clements, and we are glad to have you say it with no uncertain sound.

Church Extension Notes

Up to Monday, Sept. 23, the receipts for Church Extension had been $5,964.52. This is a gain over last year for the first twenty-three days of September of $1,131.34. The churches have sent during this period, $526.15 more than last year.

It should be noted that only the smaller offerings have thus far been reported. The churches that usually send the largest offerings have not yet reported, except in a few cases. These churches have waited until Sunday the 22nd to send their report, in order that they might make their collection as large as possible.

If your church cannot get an offering to our board to help reach the million dollar mark by Sept. 30, we hope that you can send your offering sometime during the first fifteen days of October, so that we may include it in an aditional report which will be made at the Louisville Convention, which begins on Oct. 15. When this is written we still need about $28,000 to reach the million. We must surely get the million by the time of the Louisville Convention.

In the Church Extension notes of last week our board reported that a loan of $600 had been promised to the Christian Church at North Middletown, Ky. It should have been stated that this $600 was promised to the colored Christian Church to help them erect their building. Our board is glad to make this correction because our white brethren at North Middletown are erecting a new $2,000 building and they are doing it without the aid of any one except their local congregation and the church will be dedicated free of debt.

Benevolent Association News

The National Benevolent Association has just received another fine annuity. The amount is $4,000. It was given by a good woman out of her little. She said "I want the Lord's poor to have it when I die. I feel that it will be safer to give it now. I need it now to help me live and work for Him." Here is an example worthy of imitation.

The association has under its care now 425 children and seventy-five aged brethren sent to it by the churches. These presons are the wards of the churches. The churches sustain this family, and the churches receive the credit and are, therefore, strengthened in the eyes of the world.

Frank W. Harlow, recently minister of the church at Blue Mound, Ill., has been employed to represent the association in Iowa. We commend him to all the brethren for his own sake and for the sake of the work which he represents.

There are several vacancies in our school for nurses in connection with the Christian Hospital at Valparaiso, Indiana.

The following named persons have been elected to serve as the nominating committee for the Louisvile Convention: C. C. Garrigues, St. Louis; L. J. Marshall, Kansas City; Miss Mollie Hughes, Independence, Mo., Mesdames. W. D. Harrison, St. Louis, and E. P. Wise, East Liverpool, Ohio. They will nominate the officers and board members of the association. Jas. H. Mohorter.

The Convention of the Foreign Society

At the Portland convention in July, 1911, the following resolutions were adopted:

(1) "That each of the churches entitled to be represented according to the Constitution of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, be requested to send a representative to the National Convention.

(2) "That the Executive Committee address letters to these churches, enclosing credentials, to be used by the representatives to the convention.

(3) "That during the sessions of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society these representatives, together with the Life Directors, Life Members and Annual Members, sit in a body. And that provision for this be made by those who arrange for the convention."

The Sixth Article of the Constitution of the Foreign Society reads as follows:

"Any member of the Church of Christ may become a Life Director by the payment of $500 which may be paid in five annual installments; or a Life Member, by the payment of $100 in five installments; or an Annual Member by the payment of $10; or any Church of Christ, or Sunday-school, or Sunday-school Class, or Missionary Association, may be represented in the directorship or the membership for fifteen years by paying, respectively, $500 or $100, in five annual installments; provided the representative is a member of the Church of Christ."

The Life Directors, Life Members, Annual Members, and the Representatives of Churches, Sunday-schools, and C. E. Societies are asked to sit in the body of the Armory on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 17, when the business of the Society will be transacted. Space will be reserved for them if they are on hand on time. Visitors are respectfully requested to find seats in other parts of the Armory.

Co-operation Among Missions in India.

Missionaries in India are fast learning that in co-operation is strength. They are learning that it saves time and money and makes for efficiency. There are a number of things in which they are already working together.

One is in the training of new missionaries in the language and preparing them for their work. A school will be opened this coming November in Lucknow for the instruction of new missionaries in the Hindi and Urdu Language and in the Hindu and Mohammedan religions. Instruction will also be given in practical work, both in the class room and among the people. All the leading missions of this part of India are co-operating in this work. We Disciples hope to send several new missionaries to this school next November. It is believed that this method will be much better than the old method of placing in the hands of a new missionary a course of study and leaving him to work at the language in his own way. The help of experts in the language, both European and native will be of the greatest value to the new missionary. The examination of missionaries in the language is now carried on by an examination board. Two of our Disciple missionaries are examiners in Hindi.

We have been conducting yearly in July or August, at a time when because of the heavy rains it is not possible to do village itinerating, a summer school for our Indian pastors and preachers. This has been found very helpful. This year we enlarged on our plans and invited three other missions to co-operate with us. These three are the other missions who, besides the Disciples, are at work in Jubbulpore; the Church Missionary Society, the Wesleyan Mission and the Methodist Mission. They were glad to co-operate. It was decided to hold a summer school for three weeks and that the subject of the instruction should be Mohammedanism. This was decided upon and the speakers chosen eight months ahead that thorough preparation might be made. The school opened on August 8, in the Bible College at Jubbulpore. To our surprise and delight there were from the four missions co-operating, more than 100 pastors and preachers present.

The courses given are as follows. A course in the Koran by Rev. C. Mylrea of the Church Missionary Society, Lucknow. A course in the Mohammedan World by Dr. G. W. Brown of Jubbulpore. A course in the Life of Mohammed by O. J. Grainger. A course in Methods of Work Among Mohammedans by Dr. A. H. Ewing of the Presbyterian College, Allahabad. Bible courses also were given, one by Rev. W. C. Macdougall of Jubbulpore.

The above courses were given in the morning. There was an afternoon session from three to five o'clock but it was entirely in the hands of the Indian brethren who planned and carried out their own program. This consisted of book reviews, papers and discussions bearing on the general subject of the school. The Indian brethren showed great ability and skill in the way in which they have conducted their part of the work.

All agree that the summer has been a success and that it will enable our men to be much more efficient in their work among Mohammedan people. It is planned for the same missions to co-operate again next year in a summer school and men may be invited from still other missions who this year did attend.

The summer school is for preachers and teachers but in October or November of each year there is held in Jubbulpore a convention for the rank and file of the Indian Christians. The object of the gathering is to give Bible instructions and to deepen the spiritual life. This has been found a beneficial gathering and all the missions of Central India have been co-operating in it. This year G. W. Brown and O. J. Grainger are to be among the speakers.

The result of this co-operation is seen in a greater love and respect for one another, in the strengthening and encouragement of the Indian Christians and in greated efficiency in work.

O. J. GRAINGER.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

The Test of Answered Prayer

What is the hardest test our Lord doth lay
  Upon His saints? Is it the boon denied,
  The humbling blow that lays in dust our pride,
The pang of pain—or death that steals away
Our best beloved? In all of these we say,
  Thy will be done, and cling to Christ, our Guide.

But answered prayer!—When doors are opened wide
  In heathen lands, why do we still delay
  To enter in with gifts of gold and life?
When countless hearts are opened to the plea
  For Christian union—why is bitter strife
Still rife within the Church?—Why are not we Struggling to reach the goal to which we're heir?
  The hardest test He gives is answered prayer.

—Ida Withers Harrison.

CHICAGO

The Vice Situation in Chicago

Every twenty-four hours brings new developments in the vice situation in Chicago. The situation at West Hammond was brought before the grand jury and there seemed a disposition on the part of the prosecuting attorney's office to put the gag rule on the testimony. A clamor arose however, and Miss Brooks was permitted to tell all she knew. There was suggestion of a special grand jury and a special prosecuting attorney, but this idea has been abandoned.

States Attorney Wayman now makes a statement, rather remarkable, that he had assumed that the community wanted protected vice reserves but being convined that public sentiment has turned against this way of handling the social evil, he now proposes to prosecute. Warrants are being issued for keepers of dives and owners of property. We hope the latter will be pushed with greater vigor. It will make some disclosures that will surprise us all no doubt.

The vice prosecution in New York has brought the development that Mayor Gaynor charges William Randolph Hearst of being the owner of levee property in another man's name. It is openly charged in Chicago that there is property used for disorderly purposes owned by a certain Catholic Bishop.

The inhabitants of the levee are without shame but the men who get exorbitant rent for the use of property for immoral purposes are men who would dodge the searchlight. The publishing of the names of all the men who own such property would get vice on the run faster than anything else could possibly do.

Brace

Thine arm for conflict, nerve thy heart to meet—
As things alike to thee—pleasure or pain,
Profit or ruin, victory or defeat;
So minded, gird thee to the fight, for so
Thou shalt not sin!

The Call of the Christ

The Chicago Daily News says: "Christ calls men to himself, and through vision, love and possession one grows on to likeness. Jesus is the living expression of God's life in terms of humanity, and he is the supreme manifestation of the normal humanity. His life is the one character most easy to reproduce. Christ's call is to intellect, heart and will, to rouse the best manhood of this age, and for it all the world, says the author, is waiting. This is an illuminating, hope bringing, strengthening work."

The Baptist Commonwealth says: "Only a few men could have written this masterly exposition of the character of Jesus. It is a work of striking power and reality—a vital, living, convincing portrayal. Scholarly, yet simple, philosophical yet understandable, original in phraseology yet lucid, a positive yet persuasive presentation of the claims of Christ. It will strengthen the faith of those in doubt, cheer the sorrowing, give courage to the fearful, bring hope to the despairing—in a word, impart to every reader a satisfactory and realistic vision of the Master."

The Watchman says: "People who have listened to Prof. Willett as a public speaker have been impressed by the clearness, simplicity and logic with which he expresses his ideas. The same characteristics appear in the volume under notice. It is a scholarly, philosophical and understandable presentation of a great theme."

Paper, 127 pages, 35 cents.

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

The Courage of Prayer

DO YOU DARE TO PRAY?

Whether one prays or not is at bottom a question of courage. What chokes our prayer is not intellectual doubt so much as moral cowardice. No coward can pray the prayer that availeth much.

The courage needed in prayer is not simsimply the kind we need to face our fellows—the courage the boy needs who ventures to kneel on his first night in the dormitory. That takes courage, to be sure. And no doubt there are many homes in which there would be family prayer if husband or wife had the courage to acknowledge to the other the need of the open window toward Jerusalem.

But it is not that kind of fear that prevents most people praying.

We are not very much afraid of the face of man; we are afraid of ourselves and we are unwilling to trust our souls to God.

We lack the courage to face the facts of our own inner lives. Our vision is blurred when we look at our own lives. We can apply moral principles to the conduct of others but we make exceptions of ourselves. We haven't the courage to pry under all our disguises and make out frankly what our lives really are. To be honest with our fellows, to tell the truth to our customer, to pay the last farthing of the debt—that is our idea of honesty. But it is a mere highly refined honesty to look calmly and fearlessly into one's own soul and make out the facts one finds there and reckon with them as one would with any other set of facts it happened to be one's business to deal with.

Honesty is easier everywhere than in dealing with ourselves. We take a sly peep now and then at our soul. We really do not want to know what the facts of our life are. We are afraid to know.

And this timid and fearful way we have of approaching ourselves is one reason we do not pray. If we truly pray we must search ourselves. We must be willing for God to search us. But God cannot search us in any way save through our own consciousness.

Our soul is such a mystery to us. We have a certain superstitious fear of looking into its affairs, much as a child has of going into the dark. And it is this fear that accounts for our not praying. To look into our soul honestly and bravely, resolved to deal with whatever facts we find there, good or ill, in a brave and honest way—this is itself a very act of prayer.

What would we certainly find if we fairly faced our own soul?

We would find sin there. And what else can we do when we face sin except pray?

We would find broken good purposes there, resolutions formed in the glow of some illuminating experience. How weak our memory is! How soon our inspirations pass! How almost inevitable is our return to the valley from some mountain of revelation and hope! A parting, a death, a success, a defeat—some experience that shocked us into a consciousness of the deeper realities of life—but so soon that consciousness fades. How can we keep it vivid save by prayer?

We would find in our soul fertile germs of good lying dormant there. What can we do for these seeds of virtue except pray? Prayer is the atmosphere they need to grow in.

But our not praying is not alone due to moral fear of the realities of our inner life; it is also due to a faithless fear of God. We are not sure that we can trust Him and our prayer is not genuine nor availing unless we do.

It is a great risk to pray. It means that we trust ourselves to powers we cannot see. In prayer we walk by faith, not by sight. And the essence of faith is courage.

It is an incomplete definition of faith to say that it is a belief of testimony. It is not a belief of testimony; it is putting to the test the things testified to. Faith is of the will more than of the intellect. It is essentially a yielding of oneself to the unseen forces of the spiritual order in trust that "angels will bear us up in their hands."

But this is an attitude of courage. To deliver one's soul into the keeping of God whom we have not seen it to take the supreme risk. To let the crash come in business when we could avoid it by a simple trick of injustice is to turn from a path we can see to one we know not. Who can prove to us that it will be better to suffer injustice than to do injustice?

But our praying involves the faith that the laws of the spiritual world are able to take care of us if we trust them. In prayer the soul is like the aeronaut who, reaching a great height, cuts the rope that holds him to his balloon, in complete assurance that the atmosphere's laws will operate to inflate his parachute and so he will alight safely on the ground.

Great souls who have made prayer the vital breath of their lives tell us that God and his promises are to be trusted as one trusts the law of gravitation. They assure us that prayer releases energies in the universe which cannot be set going in any other way. They urge us to cast our care and our burden upon God and let Him care for us.

When our hearts take counsel of those great ones who have built up strong lives by prayer we too may learn the way to the secret place of power. But we shall never enjoy the blessings of prayer so long as we stand outside and discuss it. Only by assuming the risk, by courageously flinging away every human artifice, and acting as if God would keep his promises, can we really know the peace and power of the life hid with Christ in God.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Progressive Party and Prohibition

The liquor question has been with us a long time. About every remedy has been tried, and none of them have been completely successful but after a century of conscious effort we now have half our nation as total abstainers and probably over half living under some form of prohibition law. Both of the old parties have enacted such laws and have repealed them as well. We have had prohibition in small township units and sometimes in large state units. What we must have learned in this century if our eyes have been open, is that we must fight, but that we will never solve this question with legislation apart from education any more than we can any other question.

No right minded citizen can be a friend of the saloon. It is the mother of many iniquities. Even though it be not our fundamental social problem (who shall say what that is?), it is yet one of the greatest of our moral and social evils. It is a pity that so great a question has often been obscured with fanaticism and prejudice. We have seen the men with all the different remedies assailing each other and impugning each other's motives, railing when they should have been reasoning. We hesitate therefore, to suggest how this present Progressive movement represents a real advance to the temperance cause.

We cannot have a political party for every issue, or we would soon be in utter confusion. Every good cause, however, ought to hope for advance in the progress of real democracy. The Progressives furnish to the foes of the saloons the weapons with which to fight. They give them clean leaders, so far as any party slate today is clean. They give them the initiative and referendum, which gives every good cause a chance to stand on its merits. They give them woman suffrage, feared by the saloon more than any other political measure. The flank attack is often the successful one. It is asserted by prohibition advocates that a prohibitory plank came near being inserted in the Progressive platform. I am glad it was not, for I believe we are in a better position to defeat the saloon in the end with things as they are. If democracy will not rout the liquor forces, then there is no hope.

Investigating Campaign Funds

The present examination of campaign funds on the part of Congress is a move in the right direction. We cannot have too much light thrown on the methods by which our political candidates are inducted into office. At the same time it is unfortunate that there seems all too much ground to suspect that the investigation is being conducted in the interest of the old parties to throw aspersions on Roosevelt. Certainly no one would want to protect the Colonel from any kind of investigation but if the process stops there, we shall then know the animus of the procedure. It is entirely likely that Roosevelt, when elected as a Republican president, had the support of corporation money. That he fulfilled any contract that suited the gentlemen of Wall street is made most improbable by the kind of fight they are making on him and by this very investigation itself. Meanwhile we demand an investigation of all the financial operations of all the parties. We all know in advance what the finding will be. Big corporations often play safe by giving money to each of the candidates and then get what they can for their money afterwards.

The Progressive party has already taken a step in the direction of a better order in their effort to secure campaign funds from the people. A headquarters is open in Chicago and Progressive stamps are being sold as well as charter member certificates. The Socialists have the only thoroughly democratic plan and that is by the creation of a regular due-paying organization that helps all the time in the support of the organization.

Already the investigation has disclosed that the great corporations give large sums of money. J. P. Morgan testifies to having put $150,000 into a single campaign. The Standard Oil Company has given large sums of money. It is inconceivable that these gentlemen look upon these gifts in the same way as college endowment or other philanthropic investment. It is all in the matter of business and we shall not have popular rule, until the people pay their own bills.

Handling the Big Trusts

One of the great issues in this present campaign is the matter of handling the big trusts. The three candidates have three different attitudes. Wilson would remove their tariff support and undertake to compel them to compete. Taft would enforce present laws and regulate corporations under the existing statutes. Roosevelt would abolish the Sherman Law and give the trusts recognition as agencies to cheapen production but give the government power to regulate prices and in other ways prevent the corporation from abusing its monopoly.

The present administration "points with pride" to its achievement in the trust-busting line. During this period there have been three great corporations on the defensive. The Standard Oil Company was dissolved. Also the tobacco trust. The prosecution of the meat trust failed to secure a conviction. The results of these enterprises are now well defined.

The first effect of the Standard Oil decision was an enormous flurry in the stock market in which the men on the inside made the biggest "killing" that has happened in many a day. Small stockholders were squeezed out. The next result was the raising of the price of oil to a figure hitherto not known since the development of modern methods of production. Oil has advanced in a year over thirty per cent to the consumer.

Furthermore this profit has been without corresponding advantage to the labor employed by the corporation. There are many men working for twelve dollars a week and supporting families in this era of high prices. If an effort is made to organize a union and secure better wages and better conditions of labor, a spy discovers it and in the pay envelope is found a note saying "Your services are no longer required."

All of this indicates how utterly futile has been all government action on the trusts the past four years. Business has been disturbed all to no purpose. The administration has been working contrary to the laws of economics.

Moving Pictures in a Conservative Town

The outdoor moving picture, as an educational and recreational factor, is being given a trial in Montreal, Canada. This innovation is especially interesting because Montreal, owing to the religious and racial makeup of its population, is one of the most conservative cities on this continent.

Another evidence of the awakening of this city from its still lingering medievalism is the Child Welfare Exhibit, to be held there in October, at the same time the Canadian Conference of Charities and Correction is in session. This body has never before met in Montreal.

The Child Welfare Moving Picture Committee was formed to educate the people for the meetings in October and to create a civic demand for the child's weal. The initiative was taken by the University Settlement. A delegation representing that organization, the City Improvement League, the Child Welfare Exhibition Committee, the Parks and Playgrounds Association, the Women's Club, the Federation Nationale and other bodies appealed to the Board of Control for the use of the city parks. The mayor and aldermen granted the request, and promised the protection of the park police.

Three performances a week have been given. The pictures have been chosen to illustrate child welfare, as well as other subjects, both educational and frivolous. During the first week the attendance was 40,000. The well-ordered, interested, enthusiastic crowds were made up of fathers; mothers with babies in arms, in carriages or bundled in rugs on the grass; boys and girls; and young men and young women. Encouraged by their success, the co-operators, who include not only the already mentioned organizations, but the press, the Berliner Gramophone Company, the General Film Company, and the Nickel Moving Picture Theatre, are planning, funds and weather permitting, to continue the moving picture shows until the Child Welfare Exhibit takes their place.—The Survey.

As we look back upon the last ten years, what inner deposits have been made out of all the experiences we have passed through? For these are the only riches that are portable. Has there been a clarifying of our vision, a softening of our hardness, a detachment from the world's grossness, a keener appetite for nobleness and truth, a widening and deepening of love's holy sphere? If our journey has not brought us these, it has brought us nothing.—J. Brierley.

The Epistle of James

The Epistle of James is a treatise on Christian ethics. The heresy James condemns is violation of the moral law either by omission or commission. "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deluding your own selves." "For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works is dead."

Sternness and brevity characterize the epistle. The times demanded plain speech. "They resembled the days which had called forth the six-fold woe of Isaiah on greed, and luxury, and unbelief, and pride, and injustice, and the reversal of moral truths; and which had forced him to end those woes with the denunciation of terrible retribution."

James designates himself as a "Servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." He is content to be a servant. We use the terms employed by him and we sometimes empty them of meaning. James, Paul, and the long line of faithful disciples of the Lord have made it honorable to be called servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ. The distinction is sought by many who shrink from doing the work.

The readers of the epistle were subject to severe trials. The rich oppressed them, they were dragged to the judgment seat, and possibly there was an occasional martyr to the faith. There seems to have been some impatience on the part of the sufferers. James reminds them that they have in the trials they endure the opportunity for the development of the Christian virtues. He does not say that the trials are all good in themselves; he does say that a Christian can grow in grace and knowledge by meeting them in the right spirit.

The victorious life is one of unwavering conviction. The prayer of the vacillating man does not reach the throne of God. The courage born of faith is a constituent of wisdom. The counsel of the coward is foolishness. He would lose his life by saving it. The brave man saves his life by offering it on the altar of service. He respects himself more than he does the opinions of mankind and more than he loves pleasure. James asks us to be heroic, to learn from Jesus how to live.

Wealth and poverty existed side by side in the community to which this epistle was sent. The rich were unduly exalted by their wealth and the poor were humiliated by their poverty. Neither rich nor poor were putting the emphasis where it belonged. A man is not to be judged wise and good merely because he has great wealth nor is poverty always an evidence of the lack of ability and thrift. We still have something to learn from James respecting the attitude we should take toward wealth and toward poverty. The word we speak is not always the clear, strong word of truth, for we are too much inclined to defer to the man of money even when he has neither sense nor character.

Christianity is a religion for the life that now is. One who does not keep himself unspotted from the world and who never gives help to the weak and distressed has no right to call himself a Christian. The opportunity to put into practice the teaching of James is present to the disciple in America as it perhaps never was to the disciple of the past. He cannot only relieve distress when he finds it but he can also work and vote to prevent distress. When James wrote, the Christian had no influence with the governments of the world. Now he can assist in making and enforcing laws. The duty of ministering to the fatherless and the widow remains; the manner of its fulfilment has changed.

James lays his finger on the cause of party strife. Fighting and quarreling come from unregulated desire. Men live the narrow life of sensation. They do not organize their desire in accordance with the demands of the moral world. They grasp after money that they may spend it on their pleasures. They go to health resorts to regain strength for riotous living. The prosperity of one excites the envy of another. They provide for the future by letting their ideals go and by making friends with the world of mammon and unrighteousness. They thus resist God and invite his wrath. The wisdom of this sort of life is spurious and the way of peace it does not know.

Plainness of speech and high ethical standards may exist in connection with a tender regard for the sinful. James demanded much of himself and of his brethren. He knew, however, that his business was to save men, not to condemn them. The honor of the church is best protected when it rescues the erring. When it casts them out of its own protection it may gain something but its gain is far less than it would be if by her ministry she made the bad man good. [Midweek Service, Oct. 16.] S. J.

The Daily Press

Not long ago a prominent man of letters stated as his opinion and practice that all any person who values his time can afford to do is to read the headlines of the "stories" of the daily press. That is undoubtedly overstated. Perhaps if that eminent gentleman had been in the habit of giving the better daily papers a closer attention, he would realize his mistake. Nevertheless, the gentleman was right to a larger degree than might be supposed. Considering the importance of the daily press in the making and molding of public opinion and the power it holds either for good or for evil, it is amazing that the level of journalism is not higher. This is not denying there are daily papers of notably high character—newspapers guided by men above reproach and of marked ability. The failings of the average local newspaper might be forgiven if the subject matter were itself of the first quality. Here graver errors creep in. The reporter is usually young and inexperienced. Possibly he is a high school graduate; probably not. From the word go this beginner is taught that what the public wants is something startling, or sensational. That is the mistake which most editors are making, a mistake from the economic standpoint in the large if not from the personal angle. Too many daily papers cater to sensation-loving readers, and much news is published that is greatly distorted, even if based on fact. In any event it should never have been given to the public where all may read it, both young and old. What may we believe then? In general it may be said that accounts of events of national and international importance, news regarding definite happenings, such as railway disasters, bills passed in congress, ship-launchings, conventions held, as a rule, may be regarded as trustworthy. But while the facts may be present, in the main, "stories" dealing with such personal relations as divorce and subjects of an allied character, and those having to do with political and campaign subjects, may be read with several grains of salt. In matters affecting religion the reporting, with all too great frequency, is ridiculously inaccurate, and especially so when denominational affairs are discussed. Ministerial scandals, however, are well "played up." In behalf of the papers it must be said that in many ways the average daily is not as "yellow" as a few years ago, as much effort to improve them has not been without fruit. But if a person wishes to get the real facts and is willing to put accuracy before the advantage of getting his news daily, he should read some of the better weeklies and monthlies. Much of the foregoing is justified by the testimony of newspaper makers themselves as given at the recent convention in Madison, Wis. It is this distrust of the daily press which led to the enactment of the new federal statute intended to regulate what legislators regard as abuses. Aimed at the daily papers, the operation of the law includes 18,000 weeklies. It was a mistake, although highly complimentary to the religious papers, to exclude them from the restrictions of the law.

Sectarian Garb Again

So important does President Taft regard the matter of the prohibition of the use of religious garb by teachers of Indian schools, as ordered by Mr. Robert G. Valentine, late commissioner of Indian affairs, that he has caused a pamphlet discussing the subject to be prepared by Secretary Fisher, of the Department of the Interior, which pamphlet, accompanied by a letter from the President, has been sent broadcast over the country. It will be recalled that Commissioner Valentine, last January, issued an order which directed that "in government schools all insignia of any denomination must be removed from all public rooms, and members of any denomination wearing distinctive garb should leave such garb off while engaged at lay duties as government employés." This order greatly incensed the Catholics and accordingly, after a tremendous protest by Father Ketcham, manager of Catholic Indian education, it was revoked by the President. Subsequently a public hearing was given to the matter, at which time printed arguments were presented.

The secretary of the Interior and the President having now had the matter under consideration for months, the former orders the revocation to stand, in which course the President concurs. Secretary Fisher holds there is no legal prohibition against the employment of government teachers who wear religious dress, and that opinion is indorsed by the President. The result is that in government Indian schools Catholic nuns in the garb of their religious order, are permitted to teach their pupils, although the President concludes his defense of the revoking order by declaring that it shall be hereafter the policy to maintain "only nonsectarian teaching by government teachers in government schools" and "to leave to the various denominations interested, full opportunity, out of regular school hours in the rooms of such government schools, to conduct religious education according to the customs and tenets of each denomination."

The President's solution of the matter appears to be an impossible effort to please both Catholics and Protestants. But it is doubtful that the solution can be justified either by expediency or principle.

Apparently it is owing to his failure to sustain his position that Commissioner Valentine resigned, although in his letter of resignation he expresses confidence that the President would make a selection of his successor as distinguished as that of Miss Lathrop, of Chicago, the head of the new children's bureau. We shall watch the President's choice of a successor to the brave and worthy Valentine with interest, not to say solicitude.

Christian Union by Way of Calamity

At Regina, Canada, after that city had been devastated by a tornado, the churches joined in a union service which seemed to voice the need of every faith. A layman writing to the Congregationalist describes the occasion as follows:

A calamity more often reveals the brotherhood of man than a great occasion for rejoicing. In times of stress, too, men acknowledge the fatherhood of God as they do not always in times of blessing. One of our correspondents who has recently visited Regina, the cyclone stricken city in Saskatchewan, found there evidences of hope and courage which surprised him. He writes:

"I had reached the city early Saturday morning and had spent the day among the ruins left by the storm of the Sunday previous. Now it was Sunday again. Of course the ten young men who composed the club were going to church. They always went. Their beautiful church home had been destroyed, but the city hall doors were wide open. Fortunately we were early, for the hall seated only seven hundred. The people there go to church. And what a service! The hymns had meaning; the anthem was true worship. The minister said he wasn't going to preach. He didn't. But his words gripped our souls. There was sadness, but not rebellion. Not a discordant note was struck. Trust and hope possessed all lives.

"I glanced over the announcements, 'A joint meeting of the quarterly and trustee boards is called for 2.30 p. m., Monday, July 8, at the Y. M. C. A. The object of this meeting is to consider what steps may be taken to coördinate the rebuilding operations of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches. It is important that every member be present.' 'The Epworth League will hold its regular meeting in St. Mary's Hall (Roman Catholic) at eight o'clock Monday evening.'

"I forgot that I was a Congregationalist in a Methodist meeting house. Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Roman Catholics—we were all fellow-Christians humbly bowing before a common loving Father in time of need. So does Regina, Saskatchewan, lead in church union."

Failure of the Thomas Paine Memorial

If, at times, one inclines to the opinion that faith in Christianity is declining, there comes to hearten him the assurance that the old infidelity of Thomas Paine has gone forever. The world will build memorials to men of action, not to the destructionists of any type, save those who destroy to build more enduringly. The following from the Advance is a timely comment upon a significant failure:

The career of Thomas Paine, born in 1737, died in 1809, little known in any country today, was a remarkable one. England was his cradle and his school. America was the home of his middle life and he lived later in France as one of her own citizens. Indeed both in America and France he sat in legislative councils. He was part of his life a preacher of the Quaker sect, and most of his life a bitter opponent of every form of Christianity. Three nations acknowledge the power of his pen. In clearness, vigor and logical acumen he had no superior. America presented him with a country estate and endowed him with a competent pension. But when some admirers of his career attempted—was it twenty years ago?—to build in Boston a Paine Memorial Hall and to erect a Paine Memorial Monument there, Robert Ingersoll gave a lecture to start the enterprise. His personal contribution netted $1,300. But the America of today would have none of Paine as Ingersoll discovered. The last we remember of the Paine Memorial Hall it had passed into the hands of some church as a mission center and now comes the sole surviving trustee of the monument fund asking the courts of Massachusetts what shall be done with the $4,000 which had been collected for that purpose, and to which no additions have been made for many years. No one can read Paine's life as reported in any impartial cyclopedia without being reminded of the Scripture saying that "The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot."

Methodists Impatient at Union Delay

All who have adopted the programme of union will share the feeling of impatience with the Methodist Church of Canada. While there are times when progress seems to be impossible, there is ground for feeling that delays are dangerous. Marking time in this region is a poor business. The Continent sizes up the situation as follows:

The Methodist committee which has been negotiating union in Canada with the Presbyterians and the Congregationalists, meeting recently to consider the Presbyterian request for further time in which to develop union sentiment, responded with a gracious recognition of the spirit of the Presbyterian Assembly, but could not refrain from expressing some impatience at the delay.

The Methodist committee feels that its denomination is ready to go ahead with actual organic union, and fears that the waiting time, which is expected to diminish the antiunion minority among the Presbyterians, may increase it among the Methodists. The committee passed a resolution saying: "If the union of the negotiating churches is to be brought about, it is in the interest of the church and of the extension of the kingdom that the said union should be consummated as soon as practicable." And while the Methodists were willing to agree to coöperation meanwhile, as the Presbyterians had proposed, they put on record the conviction that "such coöperation is more difficult and much less desirable than organic union, which no provisional arrangements ought to be permitted to delay."

It cannot be thought strange that the Methodist committee is thus eager to proceed with immediate union when it is considered what an overwhelming union majority was rolled up by the general poll of the laity of the church—a ratio of fully six to one. Among young people under 18—whose votes were taken separately—the ratio was seven to one.

Will There Be Time?

When man has harnessed lightning to his will,
And spanned the ocean's breadth with bows of steel;
When he has made the universe his mill,
And set the winds to work to drive his wheel;
When he has scaled the skies with ghostly mirth
To rob the stars of their stupendous powers;
When he has probed the bowels of the earth,
And gathered up the breath of all the flowers;
Will he then pause a while to count the dead
Whom poverty and steel have ground to dust?
Will he then heed the children's cry for bread?
Or hear the mother's wail for what is just?
Will he then square himself with God and man?
Will he repudiate the vice and crime
That have endured since being first began?
God! can he do all this? Will there be time?

The "Shock" of Evil

By W. H. Johnson

The statement of Miss Jane Addams that "Evil does not shock us as it once did" has naturally caused some comment and still more serious thought. A keen appreciation of "the exceeding sinfulness of sin" has quite generally been regarded as a necessary element in the ideal Christian character, and the assertion of one whose opinion commands respect that wrong-doing no longer shocks people as of old might easily be interpreted to mean that we are drifting into an age of moral laxity—that by long contact with vice we have actually reached the point where

> "seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

A belief in the progressive, moral improvement of the race as a whole, from age to age, is entirely compatible with due recognition of the historic fact that an individual, a community, a class, or even a nation, may for a time suffer serious moral deterioration. Aside from this general truth, human nature is weak and inconsistent enough to allow lapses at specific points in the moral field at a time when the moral movement as a whole is clearly and vigorously upward. We cannot assume, then, that the deterioration which the statement of Miss Addams might imply, if it be true, is a sheer impossibility, because of its conflict with a general law of upward moral evolution. It behooves us rather to study the situation seriously, and if evil really does shock us less, to get an intelligent grasp of the reason for the change.

The word "shock" implies a violent recoil of feeling upon encounter with something which reacts overpoweringly upon some of our emotions, such as fear, horror, or disgust. The inherent limitation of human capacity for feeling of any kind makes it impossible that the same exciting cause, if frequently repeated, should go right on producing shock after shock of the same intensity as the original experience. If the effect produced on the nerves of a tender-hearted young soldier by the sight of the first human body torn to pieces by a bursting shell had to be repeated in all its intensity every time a comrade was mangled within his view, life could not endure the strain. Fortunately, the limit of his capacity to feel so intensely is soon reached, his nerves adjust themselves to the new conditions and he goes on calmly with his duty in the midst of scenes of horror which to many a man without experience would bring a complete nervous collapse. And yet it would be a great mistake to assume that the soldier had become careless or contemptuous of human life. The soldier who enlists conscientiously in a cause which he feels to be just often comes out of a bloody war with a higher regard for the sanctity of human life than he had when he entered.

In like manner it is true that one who, like Miss Addams, follows the call of duty into the midst of the vice and crime concentrated in our cities must of necessity cease to feel the severe moral shock which such conditions always bring to right-minded people at the outset, and yet may acquire at the same time a higher appreciation of the real meaning and value of virtue than ever before. But Miss Addams, doubtless, means more than that a greater or less number of individuals have ceased to be shocked at crime simply because of their frequent contact with it. In a recent volume she speaks of a New York reformer who came to Chicago and in a public address "proceeded to describe the criminals of lower New York in terms and phrases which struck at least one of his auditors as sheer blasphemy against our common human nature." This is a well-deserved rebuke of an attitude of mind all too common among many who engage in the work of social reform. We assume between ourselves and the object of our labors a moral gap so broad and deep that any effective labor across it is practically beyond the limit of mere human endeavor. The sinfulness of sin, whether it be in others or ourselves, has been transformed in our imagination into the sinfulness of certain sinners, in comparison with better people. The man whose hands are always "uplifted in holy horror" at the dreadful wickedness of some class of offenders or other is too often scarcely conscious that there is any such thing as the "common human nature" to which Miss Addams refers. Human brotherhood is not a vital concept of his thinking, and he will never get close enough to be of any real service to the classes whom he regards as so desperately below his own level. A horror of sin which separates one too far from any sympathetic contact with the sinner, of whatever kind or degree, is a questionable virtue. That is a fine touch of Kingsley in the closing chapter of "Hypatia." During Philammon's later years in the desert monastery, the monks, with their traditional ideas of woman as the great moral stumbling-block of mankind, became scandalized that he was frequently heard to mention the names of two women in his prayers. When one was sent to him to remonstrate, his answer was: "It is true; tell my brethren that I pray nightly for two women; both of them young; both of them beautiful; both of them beloved by me more than I love my own soul; and tell them, moreover, that one of the two was a harlot, and the other was a heathen." Philammon had seen and loved the essentially Christian virtues which existed in the pure and noble Hypatia along with devotion to her pagan philosophy, and he had seen and loved the capacity for chaste and tender affection in Pelagia in spite of the life of sensual indulgence into which circumstances and lack of proper training had led her.

Miss Addams has learned what all of us must learn if some of the most perplexing social problems of the age are ever to be solved, and that is that those whose lives we would make better and happier must not be set off in the distance and treated as "classes"—defective, dependent, vicious, or what not—but that we must approach them on the common plane of human brotherhood, enlist the really good qualities which the sympathetic eye will always find already in their possession, and work right along with them, not specifically and exclusively for their elevation, but for the elevation of all. The man or woman who learns to work with others in this way, rather than for them, learns to know better what human nature is, in himself as well as in others, with its unmeasurable capacities for both good and evil, whatever the class to which one belongs or the circumstances by which he is surrounded. With this better knowledge of the real range of possibilities within any human heart, we are somewhat less surprised, and hence less severely shocked, that this woman has become a shoplifter under one set of temptations and that one sold her virtue for money under another; that certain surroundings have made a wife-murderer out of one man and different surroundings a burglar of another. When we learn thoroughly that Pharisaism in those who have been blessed with good training and surroundings may really be just as wide a deviation from what can fairly be asked in the way of moral achievement as theft, violence or unchastity on the part of those to whom these helpful surroundings have been denied, the upward path will be easier for all. So far as the lessening sense of "shock" from contact with human wrong-doing which Miss Addams has noted comes from progress toward a completer human sympathy, it is to be heartily welcomed, rather than regretted. In this particular aspect of her work she is probably in advance of the sentiment prevalent in most of the more distinctively religious agencies at work in the same field, just as the pioneer anti-slavery men were in advance of the sentiment prevalent in the churches of their day. Let us hope that neither the ethical nor the distinctively religious agencies in this work may despise the aid of the other, or scorn to learn from the other on due occasion, for their ultimate ends are not necessarily antagonistic at any point and are certainly identical at many.

The Man Who Burned Out for God

The Life Story of the Sainted Henry Martyn

By Bernard Gruenstein

The centennial of Henry Martyn's pre mature death will be observed by the Christian world next Wednesday, October 16, as a day of definite prayer for the Moslem world. As Wednesday night is usually given over to the midweek services of the churches, it would be a splendid idea to make next Wednesday night a missionary night as well as a prayer night.

When Henry Martyn died in Tokat, Persia, on October 16, 1812, he was exactly thirty-one years, seven months and twenty-eight days old. He had not lived a generation, and yet he accomplished more than most missionaries achieve even after labors extending over a period greater than Martyn's natural life time. The fact that the entire Christian world is called to definite prayer 100 years after his death, speaks for itself. His death brought an eloquent tribute of verse from Lord Macaulay. His brief life found its way even into a popular novel written in 1871 by "Holmes Lee" (Miss Harriet Parr) under the title of "Her Title of Honor." His influence was felt in the most unexpected of places like Halle, Germany, where the celebrated Professor Tholuck many years later acknowledged his indebtedness as follows: "The biography of the missionary Martyn—the man who, even among the Persian Mohammedans, was known only as the holy—opened also in my life a new era of religious progress."

Influence on Cambridge.

How profoundly he affected his alma mater, the University of Cambridge, England, may easily be imagined when it is told that about 450 Cambridge graduates have followed the footsteps of Henry Martyn into India and Persia, raising the Cross where only the Crescent is known. And yet it can be fairly said from one point of view that Henry Martyn might be considered a missionary failure so far as direct results may be taken into account. His entire labor in the Moslem world did not last seven years. He had only one convert to his credit in India. But if he failed as a missionary directly, he became the most brilliant translator of his day and the influences he has set so dynamically into motion can never be reckoned. Henry Martyn's genius was in translation, as we shall soon see.

Father a Cornwall Miner.

Martyn's father, John Martyn, was originally a common miner in the Gwennap mines of Cornwall, England, but by native intelligence and perseverance he climbed the industrial ladder until he became the head clerk of a merchant's office at Truro, where Henry Martyn was born on February 18, 1781. One biographer describes little Henry as "a delicate, consumptive boy", and yet Henry persevered, much like his father did before him, at the Truro Grammar School from 1788 to October, 1797, when he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, after failing to obtain a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. After four years of classical studies, this miner's son, "a delicate consumptive boy," not only took the Cambridge B. A. degree, but graduated as "senior wrangler" and carried off besides honors as a first Smith's prizeman. We find him elected a Fellow of Cambridge on April 5, 1802, when he won the first Latin prize.

Influence of Charles Simeon.

It was in this moulding period of his life, when fellow students knew him as "the man who had not lost an hour," that Henry Martyn gradually arrived at the great decision of his life. He wanted to be a barrister, but he was destined otherwise. His devoted sister induced him to read and study the Scriptures. He fell under the spell of that great evangelical leader of his day, Charles Simeon, the university preacher. Simeon mentioned William Carey to the youth, and said: "Martyn, are you not the sort of man who might give your life to the evangelization of India?" Here the seed was planted. Young Martin was given "The Life of David Brainerd" to read. Slowly he was coming to that grand resolve of his, "to burn out for God," which resolve he fulfilled more literally and more speedily than he ever consciously realized. He was ordained a deacon in the Church of England on October 22, 1803, and was happily made a curate under the powerful Charles Simeon. A year later (1804) Martyn won his M. A. from Cambridge, and it is understood that he was about to offer himself as a volunteer for the Church Missionary Society. But reverses fell upon his young life (he was only twenty-three years old then) in the form of a lost patrimony making him and his loving sister suddenly dependent. Friends intervened and secured for him a chaplaincy on the Bengal establishment of the East India Company in January, 1805, when he also became a Bachelor of Divinity.

Translating Tasks Begun.

And now Henry Martyn is to "burn out for God" in six and a half years after he arrives, in April, 1806, at Calcutta, India. His genius, like the poet, John Keats, will be an early one, but it will be full-blown and its leaves will be spread for the healing of the nations. That trip to Calcutta lasted about ten months on the high seas in those days of snail-movement ships, but Martyn is the man "who never lost an hour," as his fellow students testified later. Detained at Calcutta, he studied Hindustani until October, 1806, some five months, before he proceeded to Dinapore. It was here that his genius for translation began. He translated the New Testament into Hindustani, the work being finished before he transferred in April, 1809, to Cawnpore, India.

Savagely Productive.

At Cawnpore Martyn became savagely productive, fighting off loneliness, disease and melancholy while Lydia Grenfell, his financee, was so far away. There was a Mrs. Sherwood there. She had a little eighteen months' old daughter, little Lucy Sherwood. The Sherwoods came over to the bungalow to cheer the young chaplain-missionary. Mrs. Sherwood gives a pen-picture of little Lucy sitting on his Hebrew Lexicon, so sorely needed by the translator, "making eyes" at him. But so gentle was Henry Martyn, we are told, that he could never rebuke the child. He was not only a genius, but he was a gentle one. It is at Cawnpore he preached his first sermon to the howling Mohammedans in their own tongue one evening after his usual exercises as chaplain for the Europeans; it is at Cawnpore that he established five little schools for the children, at his own expense; it is at Cawnpore he is gratified to see the opening of the first church on September 30, 1810; it is at Cawnpore, he translates twice the New Testament into Persian, the Psalms from Hebrew into Persian, the Gospels into Judeo-Persic the Prayer Book of the Church of England into Hindustani. He is heroically "burning out for God" in truth and in sincerity; no wonder "his praise is in the churches." It is hard to understand that all this product came from his genius before he was thirty-years old. It is easier to understand why his health failed and why he obtained leave to go to Persia where he might correct his New Testament translation, thence to Arabia where he intended to translate the New Testament into Arabic.

Two More Years to Live.

He has not two more years to live, but this is mercifully hidden from him. In January, 1811, Martyn left Bombay for Bushire with letters from Sir John Malcolm to various people at Shiraz, "the Athens of Greece" and Ispahan, another important Persian city. He is the first clergyman in Shiraz. It is here where he engaged in those interminable disputes, it seems, with all classes of Mohammedans, who cannot dispute the saintliness of his character. On July 5, 1812, he arrives at Tabriz and here the clouds begin to thicken. He tried to present the Shah of Persia with a copy of the New Testament, but that royal personage demanded credentials. The attempt was unsuccessful. Martyn was seized with fever, but the British Embassador, Sir Gore Ouseley, nursed him back to life. Sir Gore later presented the Shah with the Persian New Testament translated by Martyn, and later still took it to St. Petersburgh, and superintended its publication and its circulation.

Starts on Return for His Bride.

Henry Martyn now decided to return to England to claim his bride, Lydia Grenfell. It was his idea to travel via Constantinople for 1,300 miles on horseback with two Armenian servants. On September 12, 1812, he is starting, flying from place to place, to get to Christian civilization and to Lydia Grenfell. He is trying too to escape a spreading plague when he arrived at Tokat. But God had use for him among the angels of heaven. Martyn took to his bed. For a week he struggled with the foul disease that had laid him low. There was not one friendly Christian soul near him. He was too weak to resist, and he gave up the ghost on October 16, 1812. His grave at Tokat was crudely marked by Armenian strangers, but later other hands gave more tender care. His works have been following him. His influence belts the globe. To millions he opened up the Holy Scriptures that are able to make men wise unto salvation. But let Lord Macauley close this sketch with his feeling and eloquent tribute:

"Here Martyn lies! In manhood's early bloom
The Christian hero found a pagan tomb;
Religion, sorrowing o'er her favorite son
Points to the glorious trophies which he won—
Eternal trophies, not with slaughter red,
Nor stained with tears by hopeless natives shed,
But trophies of the Cross; for that dear name
Through every form of danger, death and shame,
Onward he journeyed to a happier shore,
Where danger, death and shame are known no more."

"He Restoreth My Soul"

By H. D. Jenkins

In the delightful "Wanderjahr" or vacation jaunt which I took between my seminary studies and my pulpit duties, I had for a traveling companion a young American of a singularly sensitive nature. He was not only open to the influences of sunshine and shadow, as we all are, but like some most delicate bit of mechanism, everything else seemed calculated to elevate or depress him.

But he was especially affected by hunger or thirst, and fatigue actually transformed him. Kindly in temperament and refined in manners, I nevertheless learned in the course of long walks and much Alpine climbing to let him rigidly alone just before dinner. He was a saint after a good meal, but emphatically a sinner before it, and no one who sat with him through the sweets could imagine what he was before the soup. He was a grizzly's cub or a purring kitten according as he was full or empty.

No Nature Fakir.

The writer of the 23d Psalm was no "nature fakir." He had observed animals as well as men; and he noted the great change that came over his familiar flock under the potent influences of "a good feed." His woolly charges were quite other creatures when on the march or in the pasture. Often when changing from one valley to another he had brought them to their journey's end, with trembling knees and lolling tongues and ugly temper, to find them by a night's cool rest and the morning's abundant herbage and water new creatures. The feeble ewes which he had been obliged to urge along with his knees were now full of happy activities; and the males which he had scarcely kept from prodding each other with their curled horns were now sharing the rich grass in delightful amity.

"Jehovah," says the psalmist, "restoreth my soul by rest and food and living streams."

Cannot Always be at Our Best.

"What a pity it is," said Thackeray, "that we cannot be always at our best. But we can't," he added with a shake of his great head. What a pity that Hamilton could not make that one speech two. But he never reached that level again any more than did his contemporary, Patrick Henry.

But goodness seems to be subject to more violent ebbs and flows than greatness. David is not the only one constrained to cry out, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" Cowper is not the only modern saint who has mournfully asked:

"Where is the blessedness I knew
When first I found the Lord?
Wheer is the soul-refreshing view
Of Jesus and his word?"

Even Elijah, whom we see one day on the heights of Carmel bearding Ahab to his face, is presently discovered scurrying down the rocky way of the Kishon and praying that God would take away his life.

A Restoring Society.

What we need today is a revival in the church. What we need today is a society for preserving piety among people of middle age. Some one has wittily said that "the Methodists preach falling from grace, but the Presbyterians practice it." We "take in" 75,000 on confession each year and "charge off" 50,000. These latter are not wholly lost. I preach to a lot of them every Sunday. They have their letters in "cold storage" somewhere, but they have lost all vivifying touch with the present church. They are not the world's people. They are the Lord's people. What they need is not reconversion but restoration—and no one but God can give it.

He gives it, as the psalmist said, through rest and food and waters of refreshing.

We need, through God's holy word, to cultivate the sense of forgiveness. We shall never get that by looking at self, but only by "looking unto Jesus." The sheep is the most defenseless creature that we know and the best protected; but it is the shepherd's "rod" that gives security.

Has Starved Himself.

Many a Christian who thinks he has "quit the church because he was tired" has really ceased his activities because he is starved. And he has starved himself. He has tried, as Eliphaz says, to "fill his belly with the east wind." He has substituted philosophy for gospel and poetry for prayer. No man ever yet became an athlete upon "bare imagination of a feast." Probably we buy more Bibles and read less than ever before in the history of the church. It is a homely proverb familiar in camp messes that "every army travels upon its stomach." That is, an army is just what its commissary makes it.

I know one farming community in a Western state composed almost wholly of farmers from Holland, in whose several hundred families there is not a person over fifteen years of age who fails to be a member of the church at the cross-roads. What is the

In a critical hour in the year 1894, the year of the Debs rebellion, the word was quietly passed around in the city where I lived, "Let every member of the G. A. R. be ready to answer the roll-call at the ringing of the city bell." Call out the veterans and save the kingdom of God. Let the old soldiers get once more in line. May God restore to the ranks the men who have retired too soon and reveal again in them the courage and endurance of their youth.

THE MARCH OF IMPROVEMENT.

Everywhere we look we see a change in the ways of the world, and usually, we may hope, a change for the better. The cities are growing larger, houses are built in what were open plots not long ago, children are growing up, men and women are learning life's lessons and coming to the fullness of human experience. So it should be in the Christian experience of every believer. As the scholar is not contented without getting a promotion from class to class, so the Christian should not be satisfied to stick fast always at the same stage of learning and obedience.—Isaac O. Rankin.

THE HIGH CALLING

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

"Clifford! Clifford!" Van Shaw turned his burning eyes on Clifford, who stood at the end of the bed gravely looking at him, and for a moment the delirium cleared and he spoke quietly.

"Oh! I wanted to thank you for pulling me up that cliff. It was a mighty brave thing to do and I won't forget it."

Elijah Clifford was not a cultured man as the word is ordinarily used, but he was more than that. He "sensed" things. He knew what to do in awkward situations. He did not know what had been said before he came but he saw in one swift glance that matters were in a delicate and critical state. He also saw in a moment what Van Shaw's condition was. He was not in a mental attitude to be reasoned with. So Clifford walked quietly up to the bedside, put one of his strong, firm hands on Van Shaw's trembling fingers as he had clasped them together and said:

"If I had anything to do with helping to save your life, I am very thankful the good God used me. But your mother will tell you when you get well enough to hear it that you owe your life, not to me, but to a braver man, Felix Bauer. I can't help hoping—" Elijah said it with an indescribable accent of tenderness—"that when you get well again, you will make the most of your life to the glory of God!"

For a moment Van Shaw looked up at Clifford in a bewildered manner, but as if he partly understood. Then he turned his head towards Helen and his glance wandered uncertainly about the room. Then he burst into a delirious laugh.

"Bauer saved me! That sneaking cur! Why, he pushed me over the cliff! I'll get even with him! Butting into my affairs! I won't stand for it. His father and mother——"

But Helen could not bear any more. She had cowered down when Van Shaw spoke the first word. Now she whispered to her mother, "Take me out, mother, I cannot bear it."

Clifford simply said to Mrs. Van Shaw:

"We had better go, Mrs. Van Shaw. If you and the nurse need any help, call us."

He took hold of one end of the litter and Mrs. Douglas took the other and they carried Helen out. Before they were out of hearing, Van Shaw was cursing and swearing in a torrent of words that made Helen cover her ears as she lay back on the cot sobbing from the nervous strain she had been bearing.

Clifford and Paul and the Indians finished the work of breaking up camp and in half an hour the party was ready to leave Oraibi. Esther had asked Clifford to wait until she went over to enquire if she could do any more for Mrs. Van Shaw, when she met her coming out of the house.

"No, there is nothing you can do," she said, in answer to Mrs. Douglas's inquiry. "Ross was always that violent whenever he had a fever. Ever since he was little, he has been the same. It is dreadful what words he will use when he is out of his head. But I cannot let Mr. Clifford go until I know the truth about the German, Bauer. If he saved Ross, Mr. Van Shaw would not forgive me if—if we didn't do something for him. But I have been so confused during all this dreadful affair that I haven't really known how it all happened. I want to see Mr. Bauer, if you can wait a little."

Mrs. Van Shaw was agitated and tearful. Esther could easily see in her a naturally good-natured, kind-hearted woman, with a superficial education, who had ruined her children by unlimited indulgence of all their selfish habits, a woman who had been brought up to believe that the greatest of all things in the world is success in getting money and ingenuity in spending it. With all the rest she was a woman of some direct force of character which, in times of crisis as at the present moment, asserted itself with considerable positiveness.

She came up to the wagons and spoke to Clifford first.

"Mr. Clifford, before you go, I want to know the truth about the rescue of Ross from that fall. I know you told me about Mr. Bauer, but I wasn't clear about it. Mr. Van Shaw would never forgive me if I didn't get the thing straight. He is very particular. And of course, I naturally am deeply interested in knowing what occurred."

"There is Mr. Bauer, madam," said Clifford gravely. "You had better ask him about it."

Bauer was in the same wagon with Mr. and Mrs. Douglas and Helen. On the return trip, in the absence of Mr. Masters, Paul was driving the chuck wagon which had been reloaded so as to allow room for Helen's cot in the rear end of it.

Mrs. Van Shaw went over to the wagon and began to ask Bauer questions.

"Is it true that you went down after my son before Mr. Clifford came?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"In the dark?"

"There are no lights on the edge of the rock."

"Did you see him lying there below?"

"I saw something that looked like a body."

"How far below was it?"

"I don't know. I hadn't time to measure."

"Mr. Clifford said something to me about finding you clinging to Ross's arm. Why were you doing that if he was lying on the ledge?"

"He had turned over and was rolling off."

"Then you were holding his arm—"

"Until help came. Then Mr. Clifford pulled him back over the edge."

Mrs. Van Shaw paused. Then she said abruptly:

"My son says you pushed him over the cliff."

"How dreadful!" a voice broke in and there was Helen, her cheeks on fire, sitting up confronting Mrs. Van Shaw.

"I know, Miss Douglas, he spoke in his delirium. But what were you doing out there together? Why should you and Ross be there?" she said, turning again to Bauer, who, when confronted with Van Shaw's charge, had turned pale and clenched his fingers deep into his palms.

"I cannot tell you why we were there. I did not push him over the cliff. The edge of it where he stood crumbled and he went down."

"Why were you there with him? Can't you tell me that?"

"I would rather not."

Mrs. Van Shaw looked uncertainly from one to another. There was a mystery here. She was too much of a woman of the world not to know, and indeed, her son had plainly told her that he was infatuated with Miss Douglas, but what had this obscure German invalid to do with it? In the midst of all her questions, Helen broke in.

"Mrs. Van Shaw, do you realize that Mr. Bauer risked his life to save your son? What he said about being pushed over the cliff is a fearful thing to say even in delirium. Surely you can't believe that, after knowing that Mr. Bauer went down the cliff to save him."

She spoke with a passionate eagerness that was an expression of one of the splendid traits of her personality,—a genuine love of justice. Poor Bauer hardly realized that she was defending him, but he said to himself even then that he had never seen her beauty flame out so magnificently. And then before Mrs. Van Shaw could reply to Helen, he said to the astonishment of all in the breathless group:

"I ought to confess to you, Mrs. Van Shaw, that just before your son fell over the cliff, I had a feeling of hatred for him so strong that I—I—think I had murder in my heart. I don't pretend to deny that I came the nearest that night to being a murderer in feeling that I ever came. But I was at least six feet away. I never put my hands on him. His fall was a pure accident. May I add that the moment he fell, my hatred seemed to leave me, and I had no thought except to try to save him."

Mrs. Van Shaw stared at Bauer in astonishment. She had never met any one in her circle of acquaintances who possessed such transparent honesty. But she was a woman who, with all her faults, had some rugged sense of honor and was more than an ordinary judge of character. She came up to Bauer closer and put out her hand.

"Mr. Bauer," she said frankly, "I believe what you say. And I can't let you leave without expressing my great thanks for your brave act. Ross must have been talking in his delirium. But you know—I remember one German proverb in my schoolgirl exercises—'Jeder Mutter Kind ist schon?' 'Every mother thinks her own child beautiful.' And I couldn't understand how Ross could make such a statement. But why should you have such a hatred for my poor boy?"

The question was one that Bauer could not very well answer, and he did not even speak a word. Mrs. Van Shaw looked at Mrs. Douglas and Helen. Helen's cheeks burned. Mrs. Van Shaw was a woman of the world and she thought she understood some of the reason for Bauer's silence and Helen's confusion. But she was also convinced that something more than a jealous rivalry between two young men must account for the depth of feeling on the German student's part.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

A BY-PRODUCT OF SCHOOL SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN

Last March, the General Assembly of Kentucky passed a bill giving the right of school suffrage to all women in the commonwealth who were twenty-one years of age, citizens of the United States, residents of the state for one year, of the county for six months, of the precinct for sixty days and who were able to read and write. The passage of this law was the culmination of the work of a decade, and the occasion of much rejoicing among the women of the state who had labored for it.

Work of Women's Societies.

But the champions of the bill realized that its passage was not the end of this work, but rather the beginning of more strenuous labors; to make a new law effective is often as difficult as to secure its enactment. The Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs, an organization of about twelve thousand women, was its chief promoter in the final and successful legislation campaign, and it was endorsed by all the other state organizations of women, except the church societies; these were not asked to join in the movement, for fear that the cry might be raised of the violation of the principle of the separation of church and state. But even these numerous and influential organizations represented but a small part of the womanhood of the state. Early last summer, the State Federation of Women's Clubs formed a Publicity Committee for School Suffrage, and it has conducted an effective propaganda in the preparation and free distribution of literature on the subject.

Campaign in a Kentucky Town.

But the real work to reach the ignorant and indifferent woman has to be down in the cities and towns and rural communities of the state. The writer thought it might be worth while to tell of the campaign in the town in which she lives, because it illustrates a side of school suffrage that is not always emphasized.

Our plea for the school franchise for women is based primarily on the relation of mother and child—a relation that should follow the little one when it enters the school at six years of age, as well as guard and guide it in the home. And all normal women, even if they be unmarried, or married without children, are potential mothers, and should share in the care the state gives to its future citizens. But there are other phases of this great subject, and it is to one of the by-products of school suffrage for women that I would now call attention.

The law went into effect the middle of last June, ninety days after its passage, and the women will cast their first vote at the November election. A mass meeting of the women of the town was called in the daily papers by the presidents of all the women's societies which worked for civic betterment. A simple, yet sufficient plan of work was adopted at the meeting.

House to House Visitation.

It was decided to undertake a house to house visitation, and secure the name of every woman who possessed the qualifications of a voter, give her a leaflet issued for that purpose, and such verbal instruction as she was willing to receive. The canvass was not only for the purpose of securing a census of the women voters of the town, and their attitude to school suffrage, but was to be educational and inspirational as well. To do this work thoroughly in a town of nearly 40,000 people meant much work and many workers.

The organization for this purpose consisted of a general chairman, who was to have the oversight of the whole campaign; in addition to her, chairmen for each of the five wards of the city were elected, and they were empowered to appoint leaders in the various precincts in their wards.

Ignorance of Ward Boundaries.

The first thing all the workers at the meeting discovered was their own profound ignorance of the boundaries of the various wards—and not a soul there knew how many precincts there were in the town! In their simplicity, they thought they had nothing to do but follow the scriptural injunction, and go home and ask their husbands; but their ideals of manly wisdom were severely strained, when they found those oracles knew but little more about the political map of the city than they did.

So they were forced to go to the Court House, and with the help of the county clerk and engineer, they finally secured maps of the town with the wards and precincts distinctly marked on them. If the children in the schools study their geographies as faithfully as their mothers and sisters and aunts have studies these maps, it will be the banner year in that department. Now, these ward chairmen and precinct leaders know their town from north to south and east to west.

Courage Grows by Action.

For a while, we feared we should be unable to get the requisite number of precinct visitors. We began to hold weekly meetings a month ago, and at the first meeting the number of volunteers fell lamentably short of what was needed; those who agreed to go had a certain gloom in their countenances that was far from reassuring. But as they went, their courage grew. At the next meeting, as they reported their visits and their adventures, their faces brightened and their voices had the ring of conviction in them. As in all good work, their own faith has been strengthened by their ministration to others. At each meeting, new visitors have volunteered, and now (a week before registration) the visitation is nearing completion.

Women Broadened in Mind and Sympathy.

Yesterday afternoon, we had a mass meeting of women, addressed by Dr. Earl Barnes of Philadelphia, a famous teacher, author, and lecturer, and by women from adjacent towns, where similar campaigns are being conducted. As the chairman looked into the upturned faces, and saw the glow of enthusiasm there, she felt that if the new school franchise did nothing else but thus arouse the women, it had more than justified its existence. Women who are actively engaged in this brief campaign, already know more of their city and of each other than ever before. Some who live in elegant homes, who ride in carriages and automobiles, have entered humble cottages and talked with their sisters who are engaged in the grim struggle for daily bread. We cannot but believe that this better knowledge of our city and its citizens will increase our love for both. Those who have engaged in this good work can better understand Henry Drummond's noble words:

"Traveler to God's last city, be glad that you are alive. Be thankful for the city at your door, and for the chance to build its walls a little nearer heaven before you go. Pray for yet a little while to redeem the wasted years; and week by week as you go forth from worship, and day by day as you arise to face this great and needy world, learn to 'seek a city' there, and in the service of its neediest citizen find your heaven."

One Sin Against Housewifery

The cause of the high cost of living has been laid at many doors, but it has been left to the New York Tribune to discover the habit of "postscript ordering" as a contributory factor. This it declares to be the greatest sin of the incompetent housewife to-day. She thinks nothing, it maintains, of calling up her grocer two or three times or sending a note to him by one of the neighbor's children whenever she happens to think of something she wants. This necessitates the delivery wagon or the grocer's foot messenger calling at her back door two or three times in a morning, instead of the once that would have sufficed had she done her ordering systematically. She should have investigated the needs of her larder and made an accurate list of the things she needed, then given all in one order. In addition to the unnecessary service she exacts from the delivery boy, she also wastes the grocer's time by calling him to the phone so often. To meet her inconsiderate demands he is compelled to hire a larger force than is really necessary for conducting his business.

Another unbusinesslike habit is her demand that the day's order given at any time in the morning shall be delivered before noon. This crowding of service into such a short period of time necessitates the employment of a larger number of butchers, clerks, delivery men and boys, to say nothing of horses, carts, bicycles or auto trucks. They are all worked to death in the morning and have time to burn in the afternoon. This extravagance is, of course, paid for by the housewife, as is only fair, since it is her unintelligent methods of purchasing which necessitate the scurry before noon and the enforced but salaried idleness in the afternoon. It is so easy to alter these conditions!

Another crime of the inefficient housewife is scattering her trade. It is a disadvantage both to herself and to the market. The larger the merchant's volume of steady trade the better terms he can give. Women, it is charged, are overprone to sympathize with the little men who crowd into districts already well supplied with markets. For sentimental reasons they split their trade, injuring themselves and the established dealer, without accomplishing anything for the "little fellow." Over 60 per cent of these fail, anyway, and the rest eke out a pitiful existence by this artificial stimulus to a business for which there is no honest demand. They would be much better off to start in business somewhere where they are needed.

One caution, in conclusion, to the housewife: However fair the market man may prove, the good manager in the house will never relax the careful checking of weights and measures, and of bills, too, in order to be sure that she is getting what she ordered, at the prices agreed upon, and that there is no underweighing.

Good company and good conversation are the sinews of virtue.—Stephen Allen.

A parsonage will be built by means of the $2,900 surplus raised on dedication day at Scioto, Ill. This church will call a pastor soon.

The corner-stone of a beautiful new house for First Church, Richmond, Ky., was laid Sept. 25. Ellis B. Barnes, associate editor of The Christian Century is the pastor.

R. S. Latimer of Pittsburgh was elected president of the Western Pennsylvania Missionary Society for the thirty-fifth time at its annual meeting held in Northside Church, Pittsburgh.

Salem, O., church, M. J. Grable, pastor, will dedicate a practically new building next Sunday. Myron C. Settle, of Cleveland, State Sunday School Superintendent, will assist in the exercises.

Neither B. F. Dailey, pastor at Greenfield, Ind., nor The Christian Century can rest peacefully until a certain error in last week's Church Life department has been corrected. It was stated that the congregation, over which Mr. Dailey has presided for ten years, had just presented him and his good wife with $10 of silver coin and table ware. In justice to their generosity and affection for their minister we humbly apologize for leaving off a cipher. It should have been $100.

H. E. Van Horn, pastor Capitol Hill Church, Des Moinee, Ia., whose call to Portland, Ore., was announced recently in this department, has decided to remain in Des Moines where he has succeeded in building up a vigorous congregation. He has been with Capitol Hill congregation six years. During that time there have been 1,365 additions to the church. In unanimously refusing to accept his resignation the official board voted a considerable increase in his salary and set plans on foot to build a new edifice to cost $60,000.

A postal card from Secretary Stephen J. Corey, written on board the Oregon, in the Busira River, Africa, and dated Aug. 12, says: "We bade farewell to Monika today and left Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard there in their little mud house. They are the first resident missionaries. The work was opened by evangelists four years ago and has 650 members. We baptized 160 yesterday. The Monieka church has come up through persecution and trial—the people are the most enthusiastic I have seen. They are children yet but growing like healthy children. It was hard to say good-bye to these earnest children of the forest. I have learned to love them deeply."

Mr. S. M. Cooper, for twenty years a member of the board of trustees of the American Christian Missionary Society and for the past twelve years its president, has resigned. Mr. Cooper intends to change his residence from Cincinnati to Los Angeles. His withdrawal from active participation in the administrative side of the American Society will be felt as a great loss by his fellow workers. His financial prestige in the business circles of Cincinnati has been an invaluable asset through the years. And more than this, his gracious, unruffled and always just temper in meeting the problems of the board, has taught his brethren to listen to his counsel and to look to him for wisdom in shaping the policy of the society.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

There were twenty-three additions in a recent meeting at Kenney, and thirty-three since February. Frank E. Welton is the minister.

W. G. McColley of Shelbyville is assisting Pastor Gamboe in a meeting at Olney where he was pastor from 1895 to 1899. Meeting is under good headway with a number of additions.

Thos. E. Israel has decided to remain at Sweetwater another year.

The names of a number of good Illinois men will not appear in the fall year books, state and national, because they have neglected to fill out and return to us their application for enrollment. We are very sorry but we cannot help it; we are following the instructions of the state convention. It may not be too late yet if the enrollment cards are sent us at once.

J. G. Waggoner has resigned at Canton and some good church will doubtless capture him before he has time to get very far away.

Jos. W. Camp recently closed a two weeks' meeting with the Eminence Church in Logan County resulting in ten confessions. Bros. Doan and Zerby preached two evenings.

Begin to announce the November offering before you go to the Louisville convention; then soon as you return make a campaign to double the apportionment. Why not? Many other apportioiments are "doubled," why not state missions? There is no offering more important and basic.

Foreign Society's Splendid Gain

The books of the Foreign Society for the past missionary year have closed. Monday, Sept. 30, was a stirring day in this office. The mail was heavy. A large amount of money was transmitted by telegrams, more by this means than ever before. The churches were determined to be represented in the offerings of the year and many that had given were determined to reach what was expected of them. Money came by wire from California, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Ohio, Illinois and New York. It was exciting to see the money roll in. We received $70,145 the last week of September. Of course, the churches now realize that they should have sent their offerings earlier

By All Means Send Your Minister to the International Convention Disciples of Christ Louisville, Kentucky, October 15-22.

And let him get the full inspiration of this great meeting. It will be the best money you ever invested, as this convention will mark a new epoch in our cause.

Encourage your members to come, too. It will do them good and give them a wider conception of the splendid work the church is doing the world over.

Write me at once whether you can send your minister. The rates are so low you will never miss the money.

in the year. And yet some churches did not reach us in time to be credited on the past year. We must close our books on the 30th of September to prepare our reports for the Board of Managers at Louisville.

The total amount received was $400,728.44, or a gain of $21,646.41. It is interesting to note the constant and permanent growth of the receipts of our Forigen Society. For example, the income has increased $126,404 during the past four years, or 46 per cent, an average of $31.601 per year for the past four years. In ten years the receipts have increased $222,405, or 124 per cent, or more than doubled.

The past year has been an especially prosperous one on the mission fields. Full reports will be presented at Louisville, Oct. 17, and published in our papers and in the annual report in due time.

It has been a great year. We hope every church in the brotherhood will give thanks to God at the morning service next Lord's Day for what has been accomplished.

We now turn our faces to the future and believe our brethern will do better during the new year than they have ever done before. F. M. RAINS, Sec'y.

C. W. B. M. Offering for the Year

On September 23 it was found that $40,000 must enter the treasury in seven days if we reached $300,000, and it seemed it would be tragic to fall below that. Although the aim for the year was $400,000, we readily realized unless the unprecedented occurred, we could not at that late date hope for an average of $20,000 per day, the amount required to reach $400,000, but we prayed and worked tremendously for at least $300,000. Letters, telegrams, long distance messages, and personal appeals were used. When the last entry of $10 was made, the amount was $326,475.87, making $66,475.87 entered the last seven days of the Missionary Year. This, with $10,000 in real estate, makes $336,475.87, a gain of $6,587.29 over last year.

Although the full $400,000 was not reached, discouragement is not to be written on any face or to be recorded in any heart. It is noted by all Mission Boards that people give more liberally for the establishing of new enterprises and the constructing of buildings and granting of equipment than they will to maintain the work to be conducted when the building is completed or the enterprise is in operation. However, the largest offering received this year, $4,500, was for the support of the regular work. Others are learning to give in this way.

The opening paragraph of the secretary's annual report is: The home base of missions means men, women, children, and money, organized to win more men, more women, more children and more money both for the future and now. MRS. M. E. HARLAN.

Ministerial Relief Race Won

W. R. Warren, new secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief, announces that in the last twenty-one days of September his work in the field resulted in securing $3,974.63 which with the office receipts for that period brought the total offerings for the year up to $20,087.88, thus qualifying the board to realize on Mr. R. A. Long's offer to add 20 per cent to the total provided a minimum of $20,000 was received. Mr. Long's additional gift will thus be $4,017.57 which together with the interest on the Permanent Fund of $1.665.54 brings the total receipts for the year up to $25,770.99, against $17,516.72 last year, a gain of $8,454.27. Thus for the first time in the history of this beneficent agency the fund begins to approach a dignity and adequacy commensurate with the brotherhood and the need of the work.

The Board of Ministerial Relief in a special communication calls upon the churches everywhere to join with their brethren at the Louisville convention on Sunday, Oct. 20, in giving thanks to God for this achievement. The offering at the convention communion service on Sunday afternoon will be the beginning of a still greater advance for the coming year.

A Woman's Benevolent Association

The Christian Woman's National Benevolent Association is a chartered organization of Christian women banded together for the purpose of caring for the homeless aged and sick, first of our own churches then, when praticable, others in distress for whom there seems no other present available aid. We have four institution—our Mothers' and Babies' Home, 3047 N. Tayler Ave., where we care for mothers and younger children and children for adoption. This home has been in existence thirteen years and has cared for 2,572 children and 1,270 mothers and placed 297 children in excellent family homes. This family averages about seventy-five. Our Christian Hospital grew out of our Mothers' and Babies' Home and has existed as a separate institution about eight years and has cared for 1,781 patients. It is located at 2945 Lawton Ave., in a six-story fire-proof, well equipped building, constructed for hospital purposes. We have from forty to seventy patients, thirty-six nurses in training, a splendid staff of phy-

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

sicians, a capable superintendent and all that is necessary for a first-class hospital. Our home in the country, started a year ago, is a ten-acre farm, about a mile west of St. Louis. Here we have mothers and older children, especially boys, This family averages from fifty to sixty-five children and ten to fifteen mothers. Our Christian Old People's Home or Hospital Annex, like Topsy, just grew.

We took a few of our old people who were homeless and destitute into our hospital; also some who were chronic invalids. This number gradually increased till now we have twenty old people in our various institutions. So we rented a large building a block from the hospital and here we have a number of our old people, some of our nurses, the mothers with children who are working in our various institutions and some extra children—altogether a family of seventy-four. Our old people have come to us from seven states. Our mothers and children have come from or been sent to families in twenty-seven states. We have no endowment and our support comes from voluntary contributions of money, clothing, food and household supplies, from kind-hearted, good people all over the land. No officer of our association receives a salary. While we have never had all the conveniences we really needed, we have never refused food and shelter to a homeless woman or child, nor is it our wish that one of our own church, whether old or young, should be destitute or neglected. We have trusted the Lord and his people by caring for 5,523 of his little ones.

Railroad Rates to Louisville

Final schedules of rates to the Louisville convention have been received from the various railroad associations. All persons expecting to attend can obtain information by inquiring of their local railroad agents. The people of Ohio and Pennsylvania will find it cheaper to buy tickets to Cincinnati and purchase there round-trip tickets, either over the L. & N. or B. & O. Southwestern for $3.75. Returning secure tickets from Cincinnati to destination. People from Pittsburg, by such a plan, will save about $4 on each ticket. From Cleveland about half as much. Ask your agent about this matter. I. N. MCCASH, Sec'y.

A National Missionary Program

The American Missionary Society of the churches of Christ is not only an interested spectator, but a coöperative factor in the Home Mission Council's effort to popularize American Missions. Since September 1, weekly charts have been furnished pastors of all evangelical bodies in our country. These posters contain latest verified facts concerning the religious needs of our republic. They are, if used to the best advantage, a text-book from which every preacher may give his people vital instruction. A pastor may make a very effective presentation of any one of the topics in a few minutes at the opening or close of his sermon, if he does not care to make use of the material in the body of his discourse. In every church these posters ought to be displayed from the wall during the week of their nation-wide consideration. A few minutes at the prayer-meeting should be given to the re-ennumeration of the items given, with comments that will make intelligent their meaning.

Every church could organize its men and women into a Home Missions Study Class during the period of this simultaneuous uprising. Enough material is finding its way through the distribution of free literature to make a practical and intensely interesting weekly study.

Supplementary to the information given directly through the Executive Secretary of the Home Missions week, 106 religious papers, 350 labor organs, the metropolitan press, country and small city newspapers, missionary and Sunday-school magazines are publishing, weekly and monthly, surveys of fields and conditions in the home land. No additional expense will have to be made, or an elaborate organization formed to make use of such material in an education of all church members to the needs and opportunities in mission fields of America. Such monthly magazines and national weeklies as Harper's Collier's Leslie's and the Ladies' Home Journal will print special articles in November. Advance pages of the Ladies' Home Journal promise a most graphic and convincing article.

The organization of committees is nearing completion, in which cities of 2,500 population will have special rallies, preparatory to the home missions week campaign. After Oct. 15 special material will be issued by Mr. Charles Stelzle for the use of pastors and leaders in carrying forward the program for Nov. 17-24.

The American Christian Missionary Society, because of the importance if its own work in the conculding days of its fiscal year, has not pushed the Home Missions Campaign. It is free to do so now. The churches of Christ will not only receive direct benefit in the utility of such a plan, but will be sharers in an educational coöperation which tends toward Chistian unity and will produce the future resources for missions at home and abroad. Our ministers cannot do a more effective service for their congregations than the making use of material, so striking and abundant, at their disposal. There is no church in country or city, however small, but is by invitation and practice, a unit in the nation-wide, and ultimately, world-wide awakening to spiritual needs.

The subjects for consideration preparatory to Home Mission Week include Negroes, Indians, Spanish-Americans, Immigrants, Frontier, Country Life, City Problems, Women and Children in Industry, Saloon and Temperance Reform, Social Conditions and Movements, The Church as a Social Agent, The Church as a Religious Force, The Church in a Unified Program of Advance. Good Things in Store For Our Readers

The Oriental Mission Field

Coming months hold much in store for Christian Century readers. No feature in American religious journalism during the next twelve months will surpass the articles by Professor H. L. Willett, from the Oriental mission field. Dr. Willett and his party of students are now on the Pacific Ocean, sailing for Japan, China, India, the Philippines, Egypt and Palestine. They will spend eight months on their tour, not in casual sightseeing, but in earnest study of the social and moral conditions of these countries and of the problems of missionary service among their peoples. The enterprise is conducted under the auspices of the University of Chicago. The work done by members of the party is of university grade and will receive university credit. Dr. Willett has been invited by both mission and native educational institutions in the various lands to deliver series of lectures before students and faculties on Christian themes. The most intimate aspects of political, educational and social life as well as the teeming life of the masses, will be accessible to him. His mission is unique in missionary history.

The account of his observations and experiences will be published in The Christian Century in a series of articles written as only such a scholar and world-traveler as Dr. Willett can prepare, and generously illustrated by original photographs.

We have every right to say that these articles will be the most significant contribution to the missionary enterprise that has appeared in current literature. Facts, gathered at first hand, by a competent and discriminating observer, and reported in fearless and graphic fashion, are what the Christian people of the Occident want. This they will receive through Dr. Willett's articles.

"Why I Am a Disciple"

A series of editorials will soon be commenced on the subject, "Why I Am a Disciple." These articles will be written by Charles Clayton Morrison, and will be a personal and intimate setting forth of the way in which the teaching and aim of the Disciples appeal to him. The series will include perhaps a dozen short articles. Much of the material will be commonplace to those familiar with the literature of the Disciples, but there will be many readers, no doubt, to whom the articles will come with the force of novelty. And even to those well-read in this lore, the old story is ever new with each new narrator.

Other Fascinating Features

A feature in which every reader is intensely interested is the story by Charles M. Sheldon, world-famous author of "In His Steps," which is now running in The Christian Century. Dr. Sheldon is the most interesting and popular writer of religious stories in America. The publishers of The Christian Century are happy to have arranged for the appearance of a story from his gifted pen.

The delight with which our readers have devoured the unique articles by Dr. William E. Barton, Congregational pastor, leader of his denomination, and a writer whose works are sought by the best magazines of the country, has moved us to make arrangements with The Advance for the simultaneous publication of articles from his pen. These articles will appear almost every week. Dr. Barton deals with live issues in a very practical, human and clever way. His recent interpretations of Old Testament stories, translating them into terms of our modern life, have been intensely fascinating.

Who can preach in print better than G. Campbell Morgan, of Westminster Chapel, London? Thousands throng to hear him in his great London pulpit. And his printed sermon possesses the same charm and conveys the same power as his spoken sermon. Dr. Morgan's great messages will continue to appear in The Christian Century.

Work of the Regular Staff

And what shall we say of the regular staff of editors who are at work producing The Christian Century week by week? Our recent discovery of Ida Withers Harrison and Ellis B. Barnes as newspaper writers of the first rank were two events that released a current of popular congratulation which seems to swell with each succeeding issue of the paper. Mrs. Harrison's department, "Modern Womanhood," has been treating of a wide circle of interests, revealing not only her remarkable versatility but the breadth and richness of mind of the women of today. Her page is an increasing delight to our women readers, and it is to be doubted if any other part of the paper is read with more interest by the men.

Mr. Barnes has leaped into a place of true leadership in his interpretation of the thought and activity of the Christian world

No man among the Disciples is better equipped to give instruction in social conditions and principles and sound forth an inspiring note for social service than Orvis F. Jordan, the leader of Disciple forces in Chicago. Underneath everything that Mr. Jordan writes there is a firm basis of academic knowledge of social principles and a rich fund of first-hand and intimate observation of actual conditions. His Social Survey page is unique in the newspaper literature of the Disciples.

The devotional studies on the prayer-meeting topic by Silas Jones will be continued. Mr. Jones' article heads the editorial department each week. His devotional writing has a distinctive flavor in that it combines the temper of piety with the insight of a trained psychologist.

The department of "Interpretations," contributed by George A. Campbell, and the self-revelations of Edgar D. Jones, under the the heading "Monday Moods," both of which our readers have so greatly enjoyed in the past will be continued and we hope even more frequently in the future.

The English Letter from our London correspondent, Leslie W. Morgan, is unfailingly interesting. Mr. Morgan is intimately connected with many of the leading British preachers, is an active participant in Free Church affairs, and writes of the religious life on his side of the water in lucid and graphic style.

Many Unannounced Features

A full table of contents for the future it is impossible to give. What has been here set down is but a description of the regular contributions upon which our readers may count. Besides these there are the carefully selected articles on vital, human conditions and experiences in the search for which the editors are continually on the alert. The procurement of these unannounced contributions is one of the main tasks to which the editors have set themselves for the coming year. Certainly no person familiar with the current literature of the Disciples can be found who will take exception to the statement of a very conservative reader who said recently that The Christian Century was "doing more to enrich the mind and widen the horizon of the Disciples than any other influence among us."

MAN OR MACHINE—WHICH?

OR

An Interpretation of Ideals at Work in Industry

The life of those who labor in the great industrial centers of America challenges the attention of every citizen. "Al Priddy" has given a vivid picture of his own early life in the remarkable autobiography "Through the Mill." But one wants to know more. Do boys still suffer in mills as he suffered? What are the conditions today in other great industries? What are the conditions under which men and women work on without protest? How are employers meeting their responsibilities? How does the development of machinery and of efficiency and economy in business affect humanity? In this book the author has told, as no one else has told, the true history of American factory life and the struggle for character. Uniform in binding with Dr. Gladden's "The Labor Question."

QUINCY GERMAINE. THE EVEN HAND

A story of retributive justice. Harshness is met by anger. They who sow the wind reap the whirlwind. The story is set in a Mill town. The characters are mainly Mill officials of opposite type; an agent, risen from the ranks, merciless and grasping; a superintendent of the old stock, son of a founder of the Mill, siding with the men. The lesson is that fair dealing and consideration for others is answered with trust and goodwill, while "Even handed justice," to use the author's motto quotation, "commends th' ingredients of our poisoned chalice to our own lips." The characters, men and women, are of various types and drawn with a strong hand. This first book of a new author is remarkably successful and full of promise. Illustrated. Price $1.20 net, postage 15 cents.

Whatever the defects of his theology, he is perhaps the greatest religious force in Great Britain today, and his standing in the non-Conformist churches of England and Wales is unquestioned. His emphasis upon the spiritual life as the foundation of all social progress is far more pronounced than it was a few years ago.

Unique envelope edition. Price 25 cents net, postage 3 cents.

This book takes into account the movements of thought—religious, philosophical, scientific—that have influenced the past generation, and also the work that has been done in historical and Biblical criticism.

PROF. EMIL CARL WILM, PH. D. THE PROBLEM OF RELIGION

This is a thoroughly intelligible, readable discussion of an interesting but difficult theme. Professor Wilm possesses some of the best literary qualities of Professors James and Royce. He is less technical than either, almost completely avoiding unfamiliar terms. He states the idealist position in a way that is intelligible to the general reader, and shows clearly that its logical issue is faith in God. Bound in cloth.

Price $1.25 net, postage 10 cents.

The Christian Century
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

The Enlarging Missionary Motive

WITH THE MODERN GROWTH of missions has come also a growth in the reasons for missionary endeavor.

The reasons given by Carey and Judson and Morrison were very intense reasons, but very simple.

To them the world was lost without Christ. Possessing Christ, they had the power to save those who possessed him not. They were therefore responsible for the eternal welfare of the benighted millions.

Their conception of missions was in terms of simply preaching the evangel by speech and by book.

With the years this primary missionary motive has suffered no atrophy but has, on the contrary, been greatly enlarged and enriched.

It is true that we do not spur our hearts to missionary service by contemplating the millions going down to eternal hell, as the missionaries of the earlier day did. If a preacher, stopping dramatically in the midst of his sermon and pointing to the clock until every one could hear it ticking thunderously, should say, "Every time that clock ticks so many souls go down to eternal hell," he would excite nothing but pity for his own crude conception both of the gospel and of missions.

Yet the obligation for missionary endeavor is no less urgent because the word "lost" in its application to the unevangelized world, has taken on a more concrete and real interpretation. The more Christian conception of the lost world makes an appeal to motives that were not touched by the earlier notion.

If a century ago there was one good reason for urging missionary consecration, today there are five good reasons.

We are learning today that missions is bound up with our secular advantage, and so the self-interest of Christian nations is appealed to at the point of the pocketbook.

Our modern business men have formed the habit of thinking of their business in large terms. They are not content to accept supply and demand as fixed and given facts. They create demand. They produce supply. A vast territory of the country is arid and unpeopled; they build a railway through it, locating towns where as yet there are none. They send agents through the cities advertising for homeseekers. Like a miracle the land that was once desert blossoms as a rose, and cities and villages spring up everywhere.

Already commerce is at work developing in China and Japan, in Tibet and even in Africa, a taste for the clothes we wear, the houses we live in, and the food we eat. But commerce is beginning to see that demand for our products, for our railways and machinery, is conditioned upon sharing with us the same social ideals. The African will never use the railroad until he is civilized. Civilize him and you have created demand for the instruments by which civilization is maintained and carried forward.

Now everybody knows that Christianity is the great civilizer. Wherever the gospel has gone material civilization has sprung up. The statesmen of commerce, the captains of industry, men who think in terms of continents are coming to see the vital connection of missions with their material prosperity.

The development of an intense peace conscience among Christian nations reëforces the primary missionary motive.

"Our Christian missions have for their object," says Theodore Roosevelt, "not only the saving of souls, but the imparting of a life that makes possible the Kingdom of God on the earth." Mr. Bryan in an address the other day earnestly pleaded for the substitution of Bibles for bullets in our dealing with distant inferior nations.

The fact is that modern methods of travel and communication are bringing the Occident and the Orient face to face. Peaceable social commingling will be impossible, unless there is identity in at least the fundamental ideals of the two hemispheres.

Bishop Brent is wise when he urges us of the West to implant our ideals in the East "in such fashion as to minimize the chance of a dreadful future clash between two radically different civilizations; if we wait until tomorrow we may find that we have waited too long."

One of the most interesting and significant developments of the missionary motive is its enrichment by its own paradox. The primary motive of missions regards the world as in need of the gospel. But this newer motive just now fascinating the minds of our most thoughtful and earnest men regards the gospel as in need of the world!

The world needs Christ; but Christ needs the world, in order to shew forth the beauties and glory of his person.

Any national or racial interpretation of Christ is bound to be but a "broken light" of him. There is more in Christ than our American or European Christianity has yet expressed. The folly of our attempts to define him in our creeds or to confine him in our sects is nowhere more apparent than in the light of the fact that among whatever people he goes he is given a fresh interpretation.

The elasticity of the gospel, its adaptability to all types of human life, justifies the Master's title "Son of Man." He is waiting yet for the full revealment of his character. Let not us strenuous, high-pressure, pragmatic occidentals imagine that we have given to Christ a full and adequate interpretation.

May we not expect that our Christianity, once we carry it to China and India, will come back to us enriched by the vast spiritual treasures of those ancient religious peoples?

After all, Christ was theirs before he was ours. He was born among them. He breathed the oriental air. His soul was nourished on the oriental literature. Our Bible is an oriental book. Where shall Christ come to his own if not in the lands which we call heathen?

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Closing of the Vice District

Chicago is now in the throes of a civic awakening on the subject of protected vice. Even clergymen have sometimes differed upon this subject of segregation and many can remember the utterances of a celebrated Chicago clergyman within the past five years in favor of districts where the social evil would be walled off from the rest of the city.

Segregation, however, has always been a theory rather than a fact. There has never been a time in Chicago when the social evil was walled in. Even though there were well-defined districts, it was never possible to keep the under-world within these districts.

The action of state's attorney Wayman in sending officers from the sheriff's office to close all such resorts in Chicago has been criticised by some as "four-flushing," since he is to go out of office in a month or two and will not be able to follow up his cases. By others it is charged that the prosecution was intended to be abortive and thus for a generation discourage the city from undertaking any future prosecutions. It seems better to give every man a chance to make good, however, and the various ministerial associations of the city have commended the efforts of state's attorney Wayman and have pledged him their support in an effort to clean up the city.

The Methodists on Marriage

The Rock River Conference of the Methodist Church has just finished its sessions and its committee on social problems has brought in a radical report. They insist upon the federal regulation of marriage and a national divorce law that will recognize only "the scriptural cause for divorce." They wish legislation compelling medical examination prior to marriage.

All this is radical enough, but it is interesting to note that the public press is commenting upon this report in terms which are for the most part commendatory. Resolutions are often inane enough, but if they embody real social remedies they often stir up public discussion.

The Industrial Suburb

The growth of Gary, the new steel suburb around the lake from Chicago has been a most interesting phenomenon. We are now witnessing the creation of another such industrial center at what is called Argo. This is located outside the city limits of Chicago about ten miles southwest near the great trunk line railroads as they leave the city. The new suburb has the advantage that it is within the five cent fare limits of Chicago. It is on the drainage canal with the consequent water transportation. In this section are located the railroad clearing yards with a hundred miles of trackage and connection through the belt lines with every trunk line in Chicago.

The creation of this suburb is the work of the Corn Products company which was formerly located quite close to the loop district and was greatly cramped for room. Since they have moved their plants out to Argo, eleven other industries have gone there and it is now announced that there is demand in the suburb for six thousand workingmen which means that the community in a few months will have a population of twenty or twenty-five thousand people, if homes can be built within that time.

The creation of such a suburb is a fine opportunity for city planning. Much admirable work was done in this way at Gary, though the city was laid out in a checker-board system that is not altogether conducive to the convenience of the inhabitants. From present prospects, there is not to be such intelligent planning at Argo. The mistakes of this present boom time must be undone in the future at great expense.

Again the saloon has beaten the church to the field. One Binzenhof was first in Gary. He is also first in Argo. The building of churches in such mushroom communities where everybody is struggling to get a foot-hold is no easy matter. The importance of such a task, however, is entirely beyond computation. The real pioneer of America is now the new settler in such suburbs. This is our true home mission frontier. We need to awake to its strategic importance.

The Barnes Recall Defeated

The Socialist party has been rent with strife this year, as we noted some weeks ago, over the question of the character of Mr. Barnes who is now the campaign manager. The Christian Socialist led the attack with charges of adultery and evil living. These and other charges were echoed by other journals who also raised the cry of boss rule in the party. At last the presidential candidate, Debs, proposed a referendum of the whole party to determine whether Barnes should resign. The returns seem to indicate at this time that about thirty thousand voted, with the Barnes crowd polling a little over eighteen thousand and his opponents a little over eleven thousand. The Christian Socialist in insisting that the party repudiate "'free-love" has been defeated.

This incident helps us to realize that socialism is no cure for human nature. There is no phenomenon of political life in America that does not reproduce itself also in the ranks of this party. If the Socialist regime was ever ushered in, and we had the boss rule that some Socialists already complain of, the tremendous power of the politician under that system would certainly make him a man much more to be feared than is the boss under the present system.

Tom Lawson's Recent Rampage

In the October number of Everybody's is another Tom Lawson article. Our readers will remember the long series of articles which were put out by the same magazine and from the same pen some years ago. They had the merit of giving a lot of general information about the stock market even though frenzied finance was written up in a frenzied way. The present articles will propose some remedies to the situation. Tom Lawson insists that unless his panacea is applied to the situation the nation will be ruined within the next eight years. Certainly we have no sympathy with those social parasites who have fattened with gambling on the stock market, but we could wish for sane and scientific treatment of this subject by a man with Lawson's chance to know.

Total Abstinence for Baseball Players

There is great consternation in baseball circles on account of the ukase of the owner of the Chicago National Club, under whose management the "Cubs" play, that this coming year every player will have to sign up a contract promising not to use liquor in any form. Strict rules of diet and personal habits have long prevailed with foot-ball teams in the various colleges of the country and in the training quarters of the pugilists. This action on the part of a base-ball management is not dictated by any moral interest but by perfectly self-regarding considerations, for the ball player who drinks has been clearly out-classed. The prohibitory laws are being enacted by various classes of employers which in the end must have a great effect upon the consumption of liquor in this country. It may seem long to wait, but the great reforms that rest upon a sound basis, come inevitably.

The Ownership of Newspapers

The United States passed a law this past summer which must have a marked effect upon the journalism of the country. The law dated August 24, 1912, requires a statement of the names and addresses of all persons who own more than one per cent of the stock of a company publishing a newspaper. Religious and fraternal journals are excepted. The statement must be sworn to and sent both to the local and to the general postmaster.

As the law goes into effect, we shall doubtless have a number of surprises as we learn the men who really control the news agencies of the country. The remedy of publicity has been proposed for a good many things in recent years, but it is here applied to journalism. We have continued reports of the purchase of journals for the propagating of points of view hurtful to public good, and the list of owners of the journals will take off the cloak of anonimity which has heretofore been placed about journalism.

Honest Toil

The man who spurns to labor with his hands will find
'Tis vanity to boast of a superior mind.
'Tis honest, earnest toil of hand and heart that bring
To man the joy from which all other blessings spring.

Denominationalism and Total Depravity

The Presbyterian Advance has the following sensible paragraph:

We hear much comment on the fact that, in spite of all the talk about church union, the efforts for union and the actual accomplishment of union in some instances, the latest religious census shows an increase instead of a decrease of religious denominations in the United States, and people moan over the statistics as if they indicated that the boasted tendency toward church union were all moonshine. It is true enough that in all church history there has rarely, if ever, been a union of denominations without a faction which refused to acquiesce in the union and sought to perpetuate one of the contracting churches, thus continuing or even increasing the number of sects; but it is rightly observed that as a rule the movements toward union are large and significant, while the small bodies which are the result of divisions or of stubbornness are very insignificant factors in the religious life of the nation. There may be an increase of small sects, but the tendency is still toward union and the churches are rapidly coming closer together.

It is well to bear in mind that "stubbornness," pride of opinion, or the dread of change, has something to do with the present division of Christendom. While doctrines divide, we must make due allowance for the results of the doctrine of total depravity, of which we are all advocates under some other name, to a greater or less degree. Perhaps, after all, depravity is at the root of many of our divisions. It is a doctrine which we can all live up to without much effort unless we put on the whole armor.

Social and Personal Evangelism Around the World

The evangelist Fred B. Smith and Raymond Robins who is engaged in social service work, are to make a world tour in the interest of the Men and Religion Movement during the first half of the year 1913. They will proceed from San Francisco to Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines, Australia, South Africa, Egypt and Great Britain. In each city which they visit they will carry out a program of a series of meetings, conferences and institutes similar to the eight-day plan they have pursued in this country. Mr. Smith will deal with the evangelistic aspect of the work for men and Mr. Robins will interest himself in social service, publicity and boys' work. They are to be accompanied on the trip by four men who were with Mr. Smith in his American campaign as singers, Messrs. Peck, Gilbert, Metcalf and Keller. These four will also give instruction in institutes on personal co-operation among all Christians, increase spiritual effort for men and boys, and secure co-ordination of evangelistic, educational, natural, personal and social methods of Christian service.

Unseemly Competition Between Churches

The following from the Presbyterian of the South will serve as a specimen of the party spirit which persists in spite of all law human or divine:

In view of all the history of the two churches, the Northern and Southern Methodist, and especially of the agreements with which the division was made, confirmed later by two formal judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States when certain property interests became involved, and in view of all the present conditions, the pushing of the former into the territory of the latter is both unseemly and against the interests of Christianity rather than for these interests. This pushing into the territory of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is just now being done more vigorously than ever, and especially in the spending of the large sums of money to maintain Northern churches in this territory and in the placing of bishops in two of the largest Southern cities. In one of the latter, Atlanta, a Northern bishop is set right alongside of a bishop of the Southern church. The New Orleans Christian Advocate states that in eleven years' work, up to 1909, the net gain in the Northern church in Alabama was only 325, in the white churches, and that in all of the eleven white conferences of the Northern church in the South the gain in the same eleven years was only 9,000 as against the Southern Methodists' gain of more than 300,000.

What reason is there for the existence of Northern and Southern Methodist churches to day? The sectional lines are fading out, and unfortunately these prefixes are the fossil remains of a condition which both reason and revelation urge all to forget. Incidentally, the desire to propagate the tenets of a Northern church on Southern soil, especially when the tenets can only incite to indignation by recalling days that are dead, except to the sectarian, shows to what lengths the best of men will go to gain a temporary triumph; and also how far apart churches may be which logically ought to be very close together. The Northern Methodist church must have something more to commend its presence on Southern soil than a name which is full of unpleasant memories. It can no more hope to succeed than can the Southern church in the North. Both branches could render a great service to the kingdom if they would forget the past so completely that battle-flag names would not be tolerated.

The Spirit That Hinders Unity

It may be profitable for the tolerant-minded readers of The Christian Century occasionally to see the colors in which sectarianism, such as still prevails in certain denominations, is reflected. For that reason we now and then make a quotation from the Western Recorder (Baptist). Whatever one may think of the questions involved, it is certain that disrespectful mention of a gifted minister will not pave the way for a peaceful adjustment of differences. There is little difference today between the men who throw verbal and those who throw clay bricks at those from whom they differ. If it were not unpopular to roast heretics at the stake, men would be found who would light the fires, and pray God's blessing upon the conflagration. The spirit of the heresy-hunter is more dangerous to the church than the heresies which excite his wrath. But the Recorder has no disposition whatever to make any other record than a sectarian one. When one peruses its pages he is compelled to wonder whether we are living in the twentieth century or in the fourteenth. The following was written in ironic commentary on the action of the Mount Morris Baptist Church of New York to which we made recent reference. That church will henceforward admit to communion and to membership those who come to it from other denominations without rebaptism. The Recorder's article follows:

RIPROARING RANDALL.

And now it comes to pass that one, the Right Reverend J. H. Randall, hitherto

"A youth to fortune and to fame unknown," has induced the Mt. Morris Church of New York City, of which he is the peculiar pastor, to vote to receive members of all other churches, by letter, into the full fellowship of this so-called Baptist church. Just how this Very Reverend gentleman can square his conscience with his course of conduct is not easily discerned. Whether the trouble is with his cranium or his conscience, we are not in a position to say, though we must confess that we have but little respect for either. . . .

There is one saving clause in the situation, and that is, the moment the church adopted the rule to receive members without scriptural baptism, that moment it ceased to be a Baptist church. It is to be hoped that the association to which this apostate church belongs will promptly exclude it from its fellowship.

It is altogether probable that this puissant pastor has already received that which is by no means displeasing to him—a considerable amount of newspaper notoriety. He may at least have the assurance that he has deliberately betrayed the trust committed to his keeping. However, he is not the first, and it is likely that he will not be the last, to essay this role. Mr. Randall, au revoir!

The Congregationalist in commenting on the above says:

The real question is whether the Recorder, in thus saying goodby to the Mount Morris church, is not taking itself outside the Universal Church of Christ in which we all profess to believe. It is certainly showing itself an enemy of the unity for which Christ prayed.

Protestant Churches in France

Protestant churches in France have received a great impetus since the support of the state was withdrawn, and they were thrown on their own resources. This is another illustration of the power that comes to a church or an individual that insists upon standing upon merit rather than upon favor. Truly, the Lord elps those who help themselves. The following facts are printed in the Unitarian Register:

A French politician predicted that the separation of church and state would mean the extinction of the churches by reason of the withdrawal of the state's financial aid. No such result is in prospect, and the reports for the Protestant churches show financial improvement under the system of voluntary support. In 1911 the Protestants of France expended for their churches $132,000 more than was expended in the last year of dependence on public treasuries, besides the added cost of $16,000 for the support of the School of Theology in Paris. All this has been accomplished without any loss to the enterprises of philanthropy and missions which had always depended on voluntary contributions. The increased annual expense, it may be noted, means that the churches have raised the salaries of their pastors.

The Book of Ruth

"This story of Ruth is the very ideal and type of the idyl; so delicate in its transparent simplicity that the worst service one can do the story is to comment on it. Suffice it to say, that the warp and woof of the tale is a friendship between two women, and the grand climax up to which all is working is the birth of a baby. Instead of war, of national strife, of political struggle, we have here great harvest festivals, ceremonial transfers of land, family contingencies such as hard times and emigration, marriage, and the strange process by which an extinct family might be restored to the genealogies of Israel: such little things as are great to the little man of everyday life. Even in the little there are gradations; in this book are found such minutiae as attentions shown to a shy, strange girl at the harvest feast, petty details for giving her unfair advantages in the gleaning field; details still more minute, how Ruth pockets the scraps at the feast to bring home to her mother-in-law, who has been sitting solitary at home while she herself has had the excitement of the harvesting. Trifles like these, fitted into their natural frame the idyl, have kept afloat over some thirty centuries of time; and this story has done more to enable us to live over again in remote Hebrew antiquity than all the heroic achievements of Joshua and Judges put together." —Modern Reader's Bible.

Ruth is a story of loyalty. There is something to admire in loyalty even when the object of it is unworthy. The person who is lacking in loyalty can be neither great nor good. Party spirit is not a sign of degeneration even when the party is narrow in its aims and clumsy in its methods. Labor leaders are right in expecting workmen to stand together for the common cause. The weakness of the church in the present day is that so many of its members have no feeling of loyalty toward it. They do not resent and expose the falsehoods that are circulated against it. What is worse, they do not give themselves to the work it has been called to do. Ruth was fortunate in her loyalty. Naomi was a woman worthy of love and confidence. She had something to give to her daughter-in-law. She took her to a village whose people were industrious, kind and upright. The new faith which Ruth was led to adopt was far better than that of her own people. Thus was she brought into larger life through devotion to a friend.

In his "Representative Men of the Bible," Dr. Matheson has one chapter on "Boaz the Kind." It is in little things that Boaz is kind and this is what brings him nearest the Christian standard. The Christian gentleman, thinks Dr. Matheson, differs from the gentlemen of the worldly school in the power of descending into minute things. He does more than the book of etiquette demands. Boaz, being a gentleman of the heart, does things the salon might forbid. "When he goes to his daily work, he salutes his servants with what would now be called a shaking of hands. His first greeting to his reapers is not the voice of the master to the employed; it is the voice of the well-wisher to his friends. He comes into the field and says, 'The Lord be with you!' and from a hundred lips and hearts the response comes forth, 'The Lord bless thee!' That is a relationship which goes beyond etiquette. It is outside the boundaries of all law; it is pure grace, or, what is here the same thing, graciousness. It is a relationship which is founded on the principle, 'Be a man first, and an employer afterwards.' It starts with the recognition, not of subordination, but of equality. It realizes the agreement beneath the difference, the unity underlying the separation."

Tribal animosities are transcended in the Book of Ruth. Elimelech and his family, driven from home by famine, find a friendly refuge in the land of Moab. The sons marry women of Moab. Ruth becomes an inhabitant of Judah. Boaz and his reapers are extremely kind to the young Moabitess who comes to glean in the field of Boaz. The writer of the book is pleased to state that the great king David was a descendent of Ruth. One would never learn from the reading of the story of Ruth that Israel and Moab were often at war with each other and that they were nearly always bitter enemies. Moab had territory that Israel coveted and Israel had territory that Moab felt was rightly hers. They treated each other with barbarian cruelty. Calamities befalling one were pleasing to the other. Knowing these things, we can admire all the more the characters in the book and the writer to whom we are indebted for them. [Midweek Service, Oct. 23.] S. J.

"Where the Scriptures Speak"

"Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent."

This has been for a hundred years the battle cry of our clan. It is an audacious word. It is a profound principle. Our fathers thundered it in polemics and put to rout their valiant enemies. Awed by its profound depths and awful heights we, their children, with self-accusation whisper it.

A whisper is not necessarily the conveyor of emasculated truth. It is often mightier than that which shakes with loud reverberations. Thunder was appropriate to the time of our fathers; the calmer expression befits our age.

Our fathers thundered against false doctrines; we plead for a right life. They did not ignore the life and we do not eschew the true doctrines. But the emphasis of religion must ever befit the age in which it is promulgated.

Now, whether we Disciples are to be a sect, having only a sectional view of truth and thereby cramping the outlook of our adherents, or whether we are to be a group of saints giving to the Church and the world a vital Christianity depends upon our interpretation of this historic slogan.

The principle in this formula was enunciated long before Protestantism took shape under Luther, Calvin and Zwingle. It is not now exclusive to us. It is held by every Protestant body.

This principle which seems so lofty and emancipating has not always carried life to the people. Too often it has been interpreted in a hard, divisive, paralyzing way.

The most bigoted sects have organized their solemn and rigid adherents with it as the central tenet of their mechanical faith.

The most bigoted sects even of our day accept this motto as law. Yet it does not make them better; but rather it dehumanizes them. It separates them from their kind, makes them unbending, uncoöperative, unkind.

It is time we were learning that religion when bad—and it is often bad—can be worse than no religion. It chills the soul that God made in its natural state human. What awful beliefs a supposedly Scriptural faith has fastened on innocent people!

How shall we guard this our clan cry from wrong interpretation? How shall we save it from an ignominious history? Strange, is it not, that a great spontaneous word may soon become a creedal law suppressing freedom? How shall we save the honor of our slogan?

This way:

We must so reverence its high principle that we shall utter it with great fear and humility. "Where the Scriptures speak we speak!" A man should tremble in his inmost soul when he dares to say those words.

"The Scriptures" in their entirety and "we" are connected by this audacious slogan.

Think of these conjunctions: Paul and we; Peter and we; the Cross and we; the death of Christ and we; the resurrection and we; sanctification and we; Christ and we!

Is it any wonder that after one hundred years we are beginning to whisper this motto? We can save it to our age by making it demand a New Testament life as well as New Testament doctrines. Whenever we made it refer simply to formal matters we could thunder it forth; but when it is seen to have to do with the profound inner movements of the soul we must utter it with reserve and reverence.

Forms are but the trappings of religion. When any body of Christian people loses its spontaneity it has become effete. We shall save the truth of our clan call by watching for fresh and vital interpretations of the Scriptures. Protestantism is far too rigid. Its divisions are the results of its unelastic soul. It has put out from its fellowship most of its prophets. Its Scripture has been the interpretation of the Church of a given age. Instead of welcoming progressive interpretation it has rallied around that of past centuries.

The Church thought it was true to this principle, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent" when it disfellowshiped Wesley, Campbell, William Booth and thousands of others. God was speaking through these men but the past centuries were speaking to Protestantism and so the Church failed to note that God had sent fresh prophets to her.

We shall save our battle cry by reading into it love as well as faith, life as well as doctrine. God is not going to damn people for their honest beliefs even though those beliefs are wrong.

"We are not the only Christians but Christians only" is a very gross misinterpretation of our great slogan. This interpretation is of degenerate days. It has in it no life or light. It smacks of gross legalism.

Every utterance of that sentiment retards the kingdom. "Christians only"! What soul of us dare assert it? We are not Christian by doctrine alone, but by life.

A ruling passion of the Disciples is the yearning for Christian union. But union will never be secured on the basis of intellectual or doctrinal conformity. Here again we must read more and more New Testament life into our historic motto.

It would help some if we would read our slogan thus: "Where Christ speaks we speak."

Christ came into the world to make men Christ-like. He set forth great principles of faith and righteousness. It is ours to promulgate them until all men come to have the spirit of him who is the heart and life of the Scriptures.

Where he speaks we must speak. Some of his words may not be plain to us; but those great words of love, peace, righteousness, immortality and all others that really are inspiring and comforting to the soul stand out in letters of light.

These words are co-extensive with our life. They measure every sorrow and joy; every temptation and misgiving; every defeat and victory. "Where the Scriptures speak we speak." Their soul and ours are one. The same great need, the same great law, the same great God are manifested in both. The depths both of Scripture and life center around the great verities of sin, death, redemption, life, Christ, eternity.

Let us not dishonor the battle cry of our clan, but fill it with the eternities.

Anvils and Hammers—A Demonstration

Conditions among the Disciples are evidently not much unlike these which have prevailed among Southern Baptists. The conflicts over methods, changing conditions, and men have waxed hot in all the democratic bodies. Those bodies that have settled the issues did so on the ground that the right of private judgment must ever prevail among Protestants; those who will not seek for settlement persist in holding to the papal dogma of autocracy and hope to find in uniformity of belief a solvent for every problem.

All such are beating the air, baying at the moon, building houses on foundations of sand. Each party will use the anvil and hammer illustration for its own profit, but time will demonstrate with unfailing certainty that those who attempt to arrest the onward march of events are holding the broken hammers, and that all sectarian and selfish appeals under whatever guise are destined to fall to the ground.

It is high time that the Disciples were adjusting themselves to the new conditions which confront them, holding the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace, each man delivering his message as God gives him to see its truth, co-operating among ourselves in all the great enterprises of the Church as now we co-operate with those of different names, thereby relieving ourselves of the folly of tolerating differences without while anathematizing those who differ within. In the churches which allow the largest liberty of thought there can be found the largest measure of unity; where liberty is denied, dissensions and divisions are the result. Liberty is the surest guarantee of unity. There is food for reflection in the following earnest words under the above heading found in the Baptist Standard (Dallas):

When the Baptists began their present methods of work in earnest, men rose up and with vehemence opposed it. The Hardshell split came, and for decades the Hardshell leaders hammered the missionaries with great energy and often with no little skill. They never let up, have not till this day. It is instructive to note the results. The anvil they have been beating—well, what of it? Have they worn it out? No, they have worn it in. It is far stronger than ever before. What of the hammers? They are worn out. What of the men? They have worn themselves out till they are now weak, scattered and ready to perish from the earth. But we have others who have been trying their hammers on the same anvil for several years. How are they getting along, hammering the old anvil? Just like the Hardshells. Many of them have worn their hammers into snarles. They have built up nothing, that contributes to the peace and progress of the Baptists. What they have done has benefited nothing. To say the best that can be said for all or any of these antagonistic efforts, they have been wasteful. They have wasted energy. The hammers they have worn out could have been useful in driving nails in a sure place. The energy employed correlated with the constructive forces of the denomination would have helped to win noble battles. Much money has been wasted. Much good fellowship has been spoiled. But that has not been all; lives have been more than wasted.

One wonders how men can shut their eyes to facts so plain and go right on in a course foredoomed by every token that ought to appeal to thoughtful people. Death is coming and these men will let drop their battered hammers and be down in dust out of harmony with their brethren who long to be at peace with them. What is it all about? It is about methods not doctrine. There is no good in it but harm. It hurts the brethren who keep on with their hammering. It hurts their families and friends. Worst of all it hurts the cause of Jesus in the souls of men.

Do We Need a Bishop?

Just now while the regulators of the brotherhood are making capital out of a pastor's suggestion that we need a bishop, it might be in order to remind them that they are responsible for the suggestion. We have had for many years the assumption of the Episcopal authority without either the sanity or dignity which is supposed to belong to the office. Those who are lording it over God's heritage are now raising their hands in pious horror at the suggestion that a real, live bishop would be a good thing, and directing anathemas at any man who dares to intimate that their craft is in danger.

Certainly it is not to be expected that these usurpers of the functions of bishops will sit by in silence when a proposal is made that more becoming dignitaries than they be named. We can appreciate the suggestion without assenting to its wisdom, for no matter how inefficient or arrogant a regularly appointed bishop might be, our peace could not be more rudely disturbed than it has been, nor many vital interests of the brotherhood managed with less competence.

We are not terrified at the suggestion as some of the rulers in Israel seem to be, but were we filled with the desire to form a newspaper ecclesiasticism such as the Disciples have labored under for a score of years, we too might cry out against the dangers of another ecclesiasticism, and view with alarm the aggressions against our prerogatives. Our present bishops have no desire to be disturbed, or to have any ecclesiasticism other than that which they know so well how to employ for their own profit. It is perfectly natural that they should contend for their privileges. But let them take to heart the fate of other special privileges.

If we had not now an episcopacy of the "curbstone" variety the suggestion from Des Moines, in all probability, would never have been made.

Our intercourse with others renders itself mainly into government of the tongue. I do not know which of these two things is the most astonishing, the unexpected importance of the place assigned to this duty in Holy Scripture, or the utter unconcern which even good men often feel about it. For the most part we have gone far along our road in devotion and done ourselves many an irreparable mischief, before we bestow half the carefulness on the government of our tongue, which it not only deserves but imperiously requires. —F. W. Faber.

Any time I happen to look up it is a clarion call to me that, if I would find joy, the real way is His way.—Dr. W. T. Grenfell.

Mr. Bryan

A Simple, Unaffected Word of Admiration from a True Lover of Heroes

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

EDITORS' NOTE: Mr. Jones, the writer of this artticle, is an enthusiast for men. He knows men and he likes men. A busy, studious pastor of a great church of over a thousand members, he is as well informed on the personalities of public men as if he were a professional interviewer for a metropolitan newspaper. One of the features of The Christian Century this season, in which its readers have taken especial delight, is the freedom of expression with which contributors and department editors have pronounced their opinions on the men and issues of the current political campaign. We regard Mr. Jones' present article as a delicious contribution to this series of expressions. And we imagine that there are few of our readers who do not share in some degree the ardent feelings of the author toward his splendid subject.

The greatest privilege of any generation is its contemporaneousness with a truly great and good man. Not the least privilege of this generation, as I see it, is its contemporaneousness with Mr. Bryan. Forty, fifty, sixty years hence to have heard Bryan will be "glory enough" for many a grandfather who will tell the wondering lad on his knee of the great days when the eloquent Nebraskan was in the midst of his extraordinary career.

Mr. Bryan is today the most dominant single figure in American national life. The politicians will deny this statement, but the people by the millions will give it hearty affirmation.

Unrivalled on the Platform.

After sixteen years of almost constant campaigning and public speaking tours such as no other American has equalled, no other man today can draw such vast audiences as Mr. Bryan. Not even Wilson, the Scholar, nor Roosevelt, the Picturesque, nor Beveridge, the Brilliant, nor Debs, the Daring, can so magnetize the millions. The crowds that flock to hear Mr. Bryan during the Chautauqua season indicate his deep hold on the masses. For one thing, they give the lie flatly to the statement one hears occasionally that the age of oratory is gone. A Bryan Day at Chautauqua is "the great day of the feast." The big crowd gathers early and patiently waits through heat and dust or rain for the coming of the Commoner. Mr. Bryan arrives amid cheers and as he smilingly mounts the platform, the crowd rises en masse and there is a great fluttering of handkerchiefs and more and louder cheering. Then, for two hours follows the steady flow of words, rhythmic, musical; the lucid stream of ideas, principles, illustrations; the strong tide of epigram, argument and occasional ripples of humor, with the concluding noble appeal to man's best nature which, to finish the figure, is like the ocean in fullness of sweep and simple grandeur. Then prolonged applause and further demonstration; next the inevitable reception, thousands shaking the hand of the tired, perspiring, but good-natured Mr. Bryan. And this, day after day for every summer, and week after week, and year after year. The Lyceum has never witnessed anything just like Mr. Bryan's great popular platform reign and probably never will again.

Greater Goals than the Presidency.

Without reaching the presidency, Mr. Bryan has attained to a uniqueness and a fame that the presidency, great prize as it is, could not of itself, bestow. Twenty-seven men have become president of the United States, but only one man has impressed his personality on five consecutive national conventions of a great historical political party, winning from three the presidential nomination, melting to tears at four o'clock in the morning another in which a majority of the delegates were hostile to his views, and dominating the fifth and last so completely as to shape the platform and name the standard bearer after fighting to a finish the greatest and best battle of his life. Mr. Bryan will not go down in history with Clay and Webster and Blaine. He belongs to a class apart and of which he is the only member.

A Great Face.

Mr. Bryan looks physically the great man, the statesman, the orator. He has a great and good face, open, frank, and winsome. The strong features of Mr. Bryan's face are his eyes, his nose and his mouth. His eyes are dark and piercing. If the eyes are the windows of the soul, the soul of Bryan is lighted as by electricity. His nose is prominent and of the Roman type, with a profile more striking than McKinley's and his was strong. And the Bryan mouth—how the cartoonists love to draw it! The story is told that Mrs. Bryan, the first time she saw her future husband, asked to be introduced to "that young man who can whisper in his ear."

Mr. Bryan's face and bold brow would attract attention anywhere. At Edinburgh, two years ago, at the World Missionary Conference, I thought Mr. Bryan the most distinguished looking man in that assembly of many distinguished and noble looking men. Mr. Bryan's democratic tastes in clothes are well known to his countrymen. Usually he speaks in a sack coat and trousers guiltless of creases. But in Edinburgh, properly enough, he wore a silk hat, double breasted frock coat, finely striped and creased trousers and he carried a cane. I think every American there was exceedingly proud of "W. Jennings Bryan," which is the way the Scotch newspapers printed his name.

A Great Voice.

Mr. Bryan possesses a great voice. I have heard four great speaking voices, whose music lingers in memory. The late Father D. J. Stafford, of Washington, was one, Dr. H. L. Willett, of the University of Chicago, another, Senator Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, the third, and Mr. Bryan the fourth. Father Stafford's voice was clear as a bell and exquisitely modulated. Doctor Willett's voice is musical and resonant, rich toned and restful. Senator Bailey's voice is mellifluous and has in it "the sound of matin' birds," so deliciously woosome is it at times. But Bryan's voice taken all in all is greater than any one of these three great voices. Mellowed by much speaking, it is like a great organ, rich and full-toned, and the sympathetic quality of it has been often commented upon. The people can hear Bryan easily and clearly, and they hear him without any apparent effort on his part. For him to speak is—

"As effortless as woodland woods
Send violets up and paint them blue."

A Great Soul.

A noble countenance and a deep musical voice are valuable assets to a public man, but these do not fully explain Mr. Bryan's hold on the American people. What Mr. Bryan did at Baltimore was greater than anything he has ever said. The greatness of the man, the nobility of his character, the purity of his life, the loftiness of his ideals—these are the qualities that make Mr. Bryan so masterful and establish him so securely in the affections of the people. If there were any spot on Bryan's escutcheon, his enemies would have found it long ago. He may have made mistakes of policy, but he wears the white flower of a blameless life, despite the fierce light of publicity that has beaten upon him for sixteen years. The trite sentiment that there can be no real eloquence without a man back of it finds luminous verification in Mr. Bryan's career. The hero worshiper is still with us, thank the Lord, and Bryan is the popular idol of millions who may or may not have voted for him.

A Bryanized Preacher.

I have a good deal of sympathy with the spirit, though not with the tact, of the Presbyterian preacher in Indiana, who, about the time the President and the Ex-President were going up and down the land saying things about each other, is said to have thrust into the very heart of his prayer at the Sunday morning service this startling paragraph:

"O Lord, spare us the further humiliating spectacle of our statesmen scandalizing our reputation as a Christian nation. Grant that out of all this heat and passion may come soundness of judgment and that some such clean, honorable man may be nominated as William J. Bryan."

Mr. Bryan may never get to the White House, but I know no man who is surer of heaven.

Federated Protestant Churches to Meet in Chicago

Indications are that the Second Quadrennial Convention of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, to be held in Chicago, December 4-10, will be one of the most important religious gatherings of the year. This organization includes representatives from thirty-two denominations, and it is expected that between four and five hundred out-of-town delegates will be in attendance upon the convention.

Among the principal speakers expected are Dr. John H. Jowett, of New York City, William Jennings Bryan, Dr. W. C. Bitting of St. Louis, Bishop Hendrix, president of the Federation, Bishops Hamilton and McConnell, and Dr. Francis E. Clark. The local committee on arrangements, which includes ministers and laymen from the various denominations, is headed by Dr. John Balcom Shaw as chairman. Joseph H. Chandler, D. D., is secretary, with offices at 910 Y. M. C. A. Building, where full information with regard to the meetings may be obtained.

Armageddon, the Battle of the Lord

By E. L. Powell

EDITORS' NOTE:—For the past thirteen years Louisville's most potent preacher adjourned the congregation of the old church on Fourth and Walnut streets on the last Sunday evening of each month to the auditorium of Macauley's Theatre, immediately adjoining, where he spoke regularly to a packed house including many auditors not in the habit of attending church services. On these occasions Doctor Powell dealt more directly than usual with some urgent civic or social theme, speaking always with great candor and earnestness. Since the coming of the congregation to its new church building these meetings have been christened "Month-end Meetings" and will be held in the spacious auditorium of the sanctuary. The first "Month-end Meeting" was held the last Sunday in September when Doctor Powell preached on Mr. Roosevelt's slogan. The editor of The Christian Century was taking lunch with Doctor Powell at his club a few days afterward, and testifies that no less than a score of men—prominent citizens of Louisville—came up to the preacher in the course of his luncheon to felicitate him on his masterful address. Is it any wonder that the editorial appetite could not be satisfied until that sermon appeared in the pages of The Christian Century? This much of that luncheon, therefore, we gladly share with our readers.

"'And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.'

"I have read the sixteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of the Book of Revelation.

"Our subject is of peculiar interest at this time when the thoughts of men and women are turned, as never before, to the great social, industrial and governmental problems with which the moral prosperity of a nation is so intimately involved. In a recent impassioned address, delivered under most dramatic circumstances, a distinguished political leader declared, 'I stand at Armageddon, and battle for the Lord.' In this utterance a mystical Scripture has been lifted into the realm of practical inquiry and investigation. Where is Armageddon? What is the battle of the Lord?

Cannot Locate Armageddon.

"I am not one of those who can locate Armageddon. I am of the opinion that there have been and yet will be Armageddons, and that perchance, America is its present location. I have no sure word of prophecy, no interpretation of the Seven Angels who pour out the vials of God's wrath upon the earth. They appeal to my imagination, terrible, beautiful, and bring before by mind suggestions of the infinite power of the Almighty. Only this, and nothing more.

"I do not know what nationalities are represented by the kings of the East on their march to Armageddon, whose pathway was prepared by the sixth angel, who dried up for their passage the bed of the Euphrates. I infer the massing of great world powers, the providential massing of great world powers, preparatory to the mighty conflict. The three unclean spirits proceeding from beast and dragon and false prophet and entering into the kings of the East clearly reveal the immoral character of those political powers which arrayed themselves in battle line against the hosts of righteousness. So much for the setting and the accessories of this sublime pronouncement of our text.

Represents Big Battlefield.

"To those of us who do not belong to the company of the esoteric, and who must read the plain meaning of the Scripture as it appeals to the average man, there is left only the interpretation which is confirmed by history and experience, namely this: Armageddon represents a mighty battlefield, on which has been fought in some critical and pivotal hour in history the great battle which has through ages and centuries been waging between the hosts of light and the hosts of darkness. An Armageddon, whether we look upon it in the light of past history, or at the immediate moment, is always on a big scale.

"There are great and sublime accessories. Each Armageddon has had hovering over the battlefield great angels of blessing and angels of wrath. No political conflict, involving party victory for the sake of party spoils, is an Armageddon. No battle in which moral compromise is possible is an Armageddon. That which is local and provincial, and that which does not have a great moral issue involved, is not an Armageddon. We may be assured, friends, that when some great conflict between truth and error, arousing a mighty nation, is on, we are hearing the tread of the mighty host on its way to Armageddon.

Not Entitled to Appellation.

"That question to which I invite your attention tonight may be stated in a very few inquiries. Is the present conflict of political parties on so big a scale clothed with such moral dignity as to be entitled to the distinguished appellation of an Armageddon? Is the battle between what has come to be described as Progressivism in all political parties and Reactionaryism in all political parties, to be distinguished by the title of an Armageddon? Insofar as the present political conflict is a party contest; insofar as the issue is one of personal ambition and party success, we may not dignify it for a moment with any high-sounding battle phrase. It is cheap, it is commonplace, it is the same old materialistic and selfish expression of human nature.

"But if underneath the tumult and the struggle there is a great issue affecting the homes, the churches, the schools, the lives of the people, we have the satisfaction of knowing that we are marching to Armageddon and that we are in the very midst of the conflict without its picturesque environment.

Struggle for the Spoils.

"I am well aware that there are those of the unthinking and careless who regard a political struggle as nothing more than a struggle for the loaves and the fishes, and when one brings the thought of religion into a political conflict he is met with some such sarcastic and amusing criticism as that which a recent writer gives to us in congratulating a brother editor to this effect: 'I am glad that your journal does not propose to afflict us with any persiflage about the rule of the people, social justice and with Armageddon and the Lord. Leave such matters for rural stores, closet philosophers and doctrinaries.'

"Our friends, in other words, would politely bow God out from the scene. I claim, friends, that the present political conflict is essentially and intensely a religious conflict. I am not here espousing the cause of one party or the other. When I use the word Progressivism I do not have reference to any monopoly of the meaning of that marvelous word in the ranks of any one political party.

"I claim that the fight between what has been explained and understood as Progressivism against Reactionaryism is a religious contest. If it be not religious it is not an Armageddon. If it be not clothed with tremendous ethical significance it is not an Armageddon.

Flays Corrupt Bosses.

"As we read this scripture—mystical, indeed, it is—we discover that it is God who is leading on in the Armaggedon of our text. It is He who prepares the battlefield and summons the contending hosts. It is described in the scripture, which has been read, as that great day of God Almighty; and yet it is a political conflict. It is God through His hosts of righteousness arrayed against the Kings of the East, the corrupt political powers of the time.

"We are told that a political struggle, in its very nature, is an economic struggle; the issues are secular, they concern the tariff, the trust, capital and labor, wages, the conservation of natural resources. What has God to do with the trust? What has God to do with the tariff? What has God to do with the question of capital and labor?

"Will you think hard tonight and see whether or not I cannot demonstrate to you that there can be no government other than one of despotism and oppression, other than a God's government, unless it shall exercise in some way, through its legislation and its administrative functions, the spirit and the meaning of religion. I contend here tonight that every battle which has been waged in this world, in the centuries past and gone, has been in some way or other associated with the economic question.

Necessarily a Religious Battle.

"This battle in which we are engaged today in this America of ours is a religious battle. Listen. If the Government has to do with the same human relationships with which religion has to do, how otherwise can it be than religious in the exercise of its powers? Precisely this is the fact. The only relationships with which government has to do are the very same relationships with which religion has to do. If religion be divorced from human relationships, the relationships growing out of all the pursuits and businesses and affairs of men, it becomes a pure sentiment without any field for its exercise or its operation.

"I grant you that religion is awe and worship in the presence of God. I grant you that religion has to do with the other world in the emotions which it awakens in human hearts and in human affections, but what has it to do here, unless it has something to do, and very much to do, with the human relationships of our human society? And how can government divorce itself from religion, or how can religion divorce itself from government, save as both deny that they have to do with life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness?

"What has the tariff to do with God or with religion? Only this: If the tariff be unjust, whether it be protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only, it is something against which God Almighty lifts His hand; for this world was made by One other than unjust, and it is written by the stars in their courses that the unjust thing, whether it be in the relationship of government and those that are governed, or between individual and individual, shall not survive.

Tariff an Ethical Question.

"The tariff in its last analysis is a religious question. It is not a church question, it is not a theological question. It is an ethical question; it is ethical insofar as the question of justice or injustice is involved.

"How does it happen that there is this outcry against what has come to be denominated as predatory wealth? What is the meaning of this intense opposition to what has been named the trust? What is the explanation of all this criticism of combination of wealth in the hands of a few men, with the mighty power which such agency in the distribution of wealth imposes? It is the aroused conscience of the people, and when you name that word 'conscience' you bring God on the battlefield. For conscience in an individual or in a nation is God self-assertive, and in the protest on the part of the people as the result of an awakened conscience against the trust, God Himself is declaring in unmistakable language that there is about the trust and about this sort of industrialism that for which He will not stand.

"Why, friends, the economic question dealing with the tariff, dealing with the trust, dealing with child labor, dealing with all these vital relationships that affect man's opportunity and his happiness, is God's question, and so it is that in every Armageddon it is the flaming sword of the Lord God of hosts that has been drawn and it is He who is seen by the eye of faith ahead of the far flung battle line and leading on to final victory.

Struggle for Social Justice.

"I read the Old Testament, and what is it I find on those immortal pages that never grow old? I find that the history of the Hebrew people therein recorded is one of struggle for economic and social justice, and that where oppression as the result of anti-social practices has come upon those people it is God who immediately comes into the very forefront of the battle, as He did when He named Moses to be His leader to lead His people out of the Egyptian economic bondage.

"Read the law of Moses and there you have government through legislation defined, government through legislation dealing with such questions as the regulation of wages, as the distribution of wealth, dealing with the questions of poverty, dealing with the questions of the stranger, or what we would call the immigrant, outside of the Commonwealth of Israel, and it is God dealing with these human relationships in such ways as to indicate the attributes of His love and goodness, and that whatever in any sort of relationship in life is antagonistic to those qualities, has His condemnatory power to deal with.

Plea of Old Prophets.

"All the old prophets were simply pleading for social justice. There is but a gleam, but a mere glimmer, of the entire world on the pages of the Old Testament. There is the grappling of men and women with bodies that were to be fed, with minds that were to be nurtured and developed, with the hard conditions of life in the midst of which they found themselves—all of those conditions God is represented as caring for, caring for so intensely that His pathway of leadership has been marked by mighty miracles as when Israel went forth under the pillar of cloud by day to be protected from the enemy that followed, and the pillar of fire by night.

"What is religion? Religion is the aspiration of the soul toward God with all the exercise associated with individual or collective worship of God. That is its Godward side. Religion, on its manward side, involves on the part of an individual or on the part of a government protection of human life, the giving of opportunity to those the windows of whose souls are closed because of industrial conditions which make it impossible to open them, through which windows need to come the fine things and the richer things of life.

Religion is Social Service.

"Religion, on its manward side, is what we would sum up nowadays in the splendid phrase of social service; and when we read the platforms of all the political parties in this present hour we find that they constitute a program of social service—social service to be rendered through legislation on the part of the government and through the administrative power of the government when such legislation has been brought to pass.

"I do not say which party represents most of social service. That is a question for you to decide. For

"'He hath sounded forth his trumpet which shall never call retreat,
He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat,
Be swift, my soul, to answer him; be jubilant, my feet,
For God is marching on.'

"Read the New Testament, and do you not find that social justice is made the very foundation stone of religion? Do you call to mind the parable of the Good Samaritan when the inquiry is being answered as to who is my neighbor? Here is a man who has fallen among highwaymen, and the church of that day passes along in the person of priest and Levite, and leaves him to die. There comes along a man who is not a member of any church, perhaps he might represent the government; and he says, 'I must care for this man, because he is my brother,' and he takes him and cares for him and sends him to the inn. It is Jesus who says that this man is the saint, and by inference condemns the church of that time.

Government and Church Separate.

"Well, you say, you are going to confuse church and state, Not at all. I claim that in administrative function government is absolutely to be separated from the church. I claim that in the spirit and quality and character of governmental administration or governmental legislation the religion of God, the religion of truth and of justice and of righteousness must control every act; and that, whether the name of God be mentioned or not, it is He who must inspire the making of the laws; it is He who must preside over the great destinies of His people as those people are affected by governmental agencies and governmental legislation.

"Why, friends, if you divorce religion from the economic question what sort of meaning has the Golden Rule? 'Do unto others as you would have others do unto you' is the Golden Rule. What is it? Simply social justice. It is not love at all; it doesn't come into the relationship of love. It is law; it is what has come to be denominated the square deal. It is doing unto the other man what you would have him do unto you. That is a fair exchange, and that is nothing more than justice.

Government Must Be Just.

"Under the spell and inspiration and power of love first of all the government must be just, business must be just, and afterward we can come into the higher realm where we are not satisfied because the law tells us to go one mile, but we will go with our friend all the way, and thus in going beyond we are getting out of the region of law and justice into the region of love, where all duties have wings and where all our pursuits and activities bring to us exhilaration, so that we can run and not grow weary and walk and not faint, and mount, as it were upon the wings of the eagles.

"It is an Armageddon if the issue is social justice. Does not God care when the child labor issue is involved? Is it a matter of indifference and unconcern to his religion that capital shall fatten on the sweat and blood of childhood and at the expense of the virtue of womanhood? Does not the Lord God of Sabbaoth come forth with His flaming sword to smite down any industrial system that is content to prosper at the cost of tears and groans and misery, making it necessary for some poets to sing the woes of stunted and starved childhood, at the cost, I say, of the beauty of righteousness and the loveliness of love?

"Thou Shalt Not Steal."

"Why, my friends, I verily believe that in the question of capital and labor there is involved every human relationship save that one of communion with God, that one which we call worship. If wealth, for instance, has grown to its big proportions through corruption, either by the methods of highwaymen or through the reception of special privileges, under legal sanction, religion comes on the scene and takes up the fight,

God's Hand at Monieka

Thrilling Account of Christian Awakening in the Congo-land

By Stephen J. Corey

Late yesterday afternoon we left Monieka on the Oregon for Longa, and then on for the final stop at Bolingo before I start for America. This afternoon I am to stop off at the mouth of the Bolingo River to meet R. Ray Eldred. He comes from Longa with two dugout canoes and ten paddlers and he and I will take a thirty mile trip up the Bolingo, to visit some important new outposts and baptize a group of waiting candidates.

But I am to write about Monieka—newest and most remarkable of all the stations. Four years ago the first baptisms in this great heathen town took place and only a year ago was the station granted. Timothy Iso has been stationed there two years and a half as regular evangelist in charge, and the membership of the church now is over 600.

Sadness in Farewell.

There is a bit of sadness about saying good-bye to these stations with their workers and native Christians. It means a farewell to isolated missionaries with whom the fellowship has been so sweet, and it means also farewell to hundreds of African brethren who have become very dear to me during this brief stay. As the steamer pulled away from Monieka beach, the great crowd of Christians struck up "God be with you till we meet again," in the melodious Lunkundo tongue, and Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard stood in the midst of their people waving their good-bye to us. They must live for several months in a little mud house which has been hastily constructed for them. It is a slow task building a new mission home in Africa, and they cannot expect to get into their real house for four months yet. In the meantime they must do the best they can with mud walls and a dirt floor.

Busy and Eventful Day

Yesterday was a busy and eventful day at Monieka. Doctor Jaggard was up shortly after day for a final conference with the candidates for baptism. About nine o'clock in the morning the great lokolo (wooden drum) was sounded and the new converts and Christians gathered at the beach near the steamer for the baptismal service. The people to be baptized were lined up in rows of thirty each and five rows deep at the water's edge. There were 160 of them, all adult men and women except a very few boys. It was a most impressive service. Doctor Jaggard took the confessions, a row of thirty answering at a time in concert, and then five of us baptized them. Those baptizing were Doctor Jaggard, Mr. Hensey, Timothy Iso, the head wheelman Ekumbalako and myself. It was a thrilling sight as we faced the great class of new believers and beyond them the congregation ranging up the broad steps leading to the top of the high bank. At the very top was a long row of heathen people from the town, making a picturesque sky line. At the end of these the mpakes (old men of the village) were gathered in a quaint group each one sitting on his peculiar chair made of the forked limb of a tree. They formed a queer picture with their almost naked and wrinkled bodies covered with red ngola (camwood) and their grizzled hair and scanty beards braided into odd little twists.

Chief a Spectator.

The old heathen chief of the town, dressed

Secretary Stephen J. Corey.

in his leopard skin cap and sash, with his red blanket draped about him for a loin cloth, occupied a place on the steamer deck. He watched the ceremony with great gravity, bowing his head in his hand whenever the Christians did. The baptism of the eight score of candidates was an event long to be remembered. Our missionaries worked almost ten years for the first 100 baptisms in the Congo, and now this great company baptized at one time represent the results of three months' evangelistic work in Monieka district alone. The evangelists come in four times a year bringing the new converts. Monieka has about fifty evangelists at work.

Church Services.

After the baptisms we went to the church service. The church building is of mud covered with thatch and is 100 feet long. The people sit so close together on the plain rows of planks that they are obliged to turn their shoulders edgewise. The house was packed and a large company of people sat on the ground outside. The old chief and the mpaka or town father, who gave up the land for the mission compound, sat on one end of the high dirt platform. Back of them was a group of heathen girls, wearing scant waist cloths, with their bodies covered with red ngola and huge necklaces of brown nuts and beads about their necks. The rest of the platform was occupied by little boys except where the white people sat. About thirty women sat on little mats on the dirt floor between the platform and the first row of seats. Iso Timothy preached. I never before so longed to understand the native tongue. He spoke with liberty, grace and power for fifty minutes. The closest attention was accorded him. He preached on the Prodigal Son and the missionaries say it was a striking sermon. Iso is a remarkable man. I have seen nothing to compare with him in any mission I have visited on the Congo. He is a leader for his people, a brilliant preacher of a deeply spiritual type.

Communion Service Grave and Reverent.

At the close of Iso's sermon I gave the people a little farewell talk and Doctor Jaggard interpreted. It was like bidding good-bye to old friends. I have learned to love deeply these children of the forest, and have no difficulty in understanding now why the missionaries are so bound up in their work. The communion service at the close was very reverent and beautiful. It was the first for the large company of new converts and the individual communion service was a little awesome to them. However, each helped his ignorant neighbor with kindly suggestion and the service was most grave and spiritual. The communion means so much to these Congo Christians. The severest discipline the church can impose upon lapsing members here is to deny to them the Lord's Supper. These black brethren can teach our American congregations some very wholesome lessons concerning faithful attendance at and reverence for this service.

The Stations Characterized.

Bolenge is our largest and strongest and oldest Congo church. Longa is the hub of the wheel with its strategic location, and its great back country in all directions. Lotumbe is a remarkably strong, substantial and well disciplined work, having had a resident missionary but two years. But Monieka exceeds in enthusiasm. For real rollicking, hilarious, tumultuous, militant, noisy enthusiasm, I have seen nothing like it anywhere. The church is young, untrained and needs discipline, but the joy is unbounded. If you want to have your right arm feel as though you had just pitched a thirteen inning game of baseball, go to Monieka and shake hands with the half a thousand enthusiastic Christians who will greet you there.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

THE OCTOBER GARDEN

The long looked for frost arrived last night, and when the flower scribe of this page awoke this morning, she doubted whether she would have any October garden to write about; but, like many of the disasters one dreads, the frost was not so fatal as she feared. When she went out with a quaking heart, she found her brave blossoms still holding up their heads, but looking disconsolate and reproachful, as much as to say, "How could you sleep comfortably in your warm bed, while we were shivering out here in the icy wind and frost?"

If they had but known it, the gardener was far from forgetting them in her warm bed, for every blast of wind that whistled about the house struck a chill to her heart, when she thought of the havoc it might be working in her garden. But they have escaped this first skirmish with the prince of the powers of the air, and at this moment there are thirteen different kinds of flowers in full and perfect bloom—nasturtiums, salvias, cosmos, petunias, zinnias, roses, dahlias, geraniums, gaillardias, verbenas, plumbago, fall sunflowers and last and best chrysanthemums; then there are lingering asters and hardy phlox but they are past their prime, and do not count. True, the frost may come in a few days or a few weeks, and lay most of them low—then it may not; in fact, it generally does not.

Autumn Pleasures.

Certainly, these clear, calm, golden days are filled with much to rejoice the flower lover's heart. Because our gardening year is drawing near its close, because not only frost, but ice and snow are on their way, is that any reason we should sit and bemoan ourselves?

An old poet, Robert Southey, was reproached by his wife for writing tales of young love and adventure, and this was part of his answer:

"Nay, mistress mine, I made reply,
The autumn hath its flowers,
And never is the sky more bright
Than in its evening hours.

"Nor marvel you, if I prefer,
Of cheerful things to sing;
The October grove hath brighter tints,
Than summer, or than spring."

This is the poet's wise pleading, not only for good cheer in old age, but for looking for higher and lovelier things all through life; and we would take it as a lesson to enjoy fall's bright flowers, even though the evil days of wintry cold and death may be near at hand.

This has been a season of unparalleled bloom. The succession of flowers from early spring until now has been of rare profusion and perfection. What cosmos we are enjoying now! And we have such dahlias as are rarely seen in this part of the world. All of the flowers have done their best, both as to quantity and quality of bloom.

Coming of the Chrysanthemum.

And this month is not only the season of completion and fruition, it is a time of beginning also. The coming of the chrysanthemum in October is as notable an event in our flower calendar as the coming of the crocus and daffodil in March, or the rose and the lily in June. When I say the chrysanthemum is here, I am not speaking of the tender hot house varieties, but of the hardy plants that gladden our garden walks and fence rows; to many of us, this homely flower is as dear as the splendid marvels that come to us from the Sunrise Kingdom. Our hardy chrysanthemum has, for one thing, the pungent, delightful odor, that is almost entirely lacking in the mammoth Japanese species. It seems to breathe of the fall, as much as the scent of jonquils and violets does of the spring. And how clinging these fall odors are! You cannot touch a chrysanthemum or a walnut or a celery plant, without your hand becoming fragrant with this fresh, aromatic essence! They seem to suit this season far better than the heavy sweetness of roses and lilies.

Time of Rest Not Yet For the Gardener.

While this is a season for enjoyment, it is a season for vigilance as well. When the frost does lay low those glorious dahlias, and cannas, and other tender, tuberous rooted plants, cut off their tops, take them up without bruising them; and store them away for the winter. They may be put in your cellar, or any dark dry place where they will not freeze, in dirt or sand or even may be stored in paper bags, where rats will not break through to devour. Your summer bulbs, like tuberoses and gladiolas, should also be taken up and dried off, and put away in a dark place.

The fall is the time for transplanting hardy flowers, with a few exceptions. Peonies and candidum lilies, which make their roots in the early fall, should be put out in September, or even in August; while late blooming plants, like chrysanthemums or plants whose roots feed near the surface, like hardy pinks should be transplanted in the spring. But hardy roses and all the lovely family of midsummer lilies—in fact, nearly all the deep rooted hardy flowers, had better be planted in the fall, than in the spring.

Joy of Sharing.

And while one is changing her plants, what a pleasant thing it is to set aside some flowers for her friends. Every true flower lover delights in receiving such gifts—not only for their beauty and perfume, but because they are perpetual memorials of kindly thoughts and remembrance.

It is hardly necessary to mention that this is the time for making beds of tulips and hyacinths and narcissus—the tempting display of bulbs at the florist's are constant reminders of this. After all, forethought and preparation are the secrets of success in gardening; in the spring prepare for summer, in the summer prepare for autumn, in the autumn prepare for spring—and so the ceaseless round of happy work goes on.

Treat All Alike

A press despatch says:

"The postal authorities at Washington have issued instructions to the postmasters of the large cities throughout the country that steps must be taken to prevent young women from obtaining mail at the general delivery window of the postoffices in their home cities. In time this order may be extended to apply not only to girls, but to married women. James T. Cortelyou, chief postal inspector, is to start the reform in Philadelphia. Hereafter persons applying at the general delivery window for mail will be requested to give their home address, and in case it happens to be in Philadelphia or the suburbs, they will be asked for their reasons for not receiving the mail at their homes. 'The general delivery window was established as a convenience to the traveling public, and that is what it will be in the future,' said the inspector. 'It was not established as an adjunct to the flirt.'"

There seems no good reason for making a distinction of sex in this matter. If it is thought fit to require all minors to have their mail delivered at their homes, well and good; but young men are quite as likely as young women to use the general delivery for objectionable purposes. Why should they be given a free hand? Or why should Uncle Sam put restrictions on married women for fear they should deceive their husbands, and at the same time give married men full facilities for deceiving their wives?

Everyone must be glad to have all proper precautions taken to safeguard young people from folly or worse; but the boys need it quite as much as the girls. As for persons of full age, the less interference with their freedom the better, so long as they do not molest others. In all probability the wives who make a wrongful use of the general delivery are much fewer than the husbands.

Deeds of Great Women

The Lady Chapel of the new Liverpool Cathedral, which will be opened next summer, will be adorned by a magnificent scheme of stained-glass windows in commemoration of the deeds of good women.

All the famous women of the Old and New Testaments are commemorated in some way in the scheme, but perhaps the most interesting innovation are the windows commemorating the deeds of great women of recent times. The list is as follows:

Mary Collet and all prayerful women.
Louise Stewart and all the noble army of martyrs.
Christina Rossetti and all the sweet singers.
Grace Darling and all courageous maidens.
Dr. Alice Marvel and all who have laid down their lives for their sisters.
Catherine Gladstone and all loyal-hearted wives.
Elizabeth Barrett Browning and all who have seen the infinite in things.
Josephine Butler and all brave champions of purity.
Anne Hinderer and all missionary pioneers.
Margaret Godolphin and all who have kept themselves unspotted in a corrupt world.
Angela Burdette-Coutts and all almoners of the King of Heaven.
Mother Cecile and all women loving and large hearted in counsel.
Elizabeth Fry and all pitiful women.
Agnes Jones and all devoted nurses.
Queen Victoria and all noble queens.
Lady Margaret Beaufort and all patronesses of sacred learning.
Mary Rogers (stewardess of the "Stella") and all faithful servants.
Anna Clough and all true teachers.
Mary Somerville and all earnest students.
Susannah Wesley and all devoted mothers.

She did not ask her question again but gravely said to Bauer as she turned to go, "Mr. Van Shaw will want to express his thanks to you. What will your address be?"

"I suppose I shall be at Tolchaco this fall and winter. I would rather not have you or Mr. Van Shaw feel under any obligation to me at all. Mr. Clifford certainly did much more than I did. If he had not gone down there, your son would not be living."

"We shall thank Mr. Clifford also. And we shall not forget either of you."

She went back into the little stone house and a few minutes later, Clifford and Paul had the horses headed down by the Oraibi Wash, bound for Tolchaco.

All through that day's drive Helen Douglas hardly said a word, even to her mother. She was going over the strange experiences which had become a part of her life since she had come into this desert land. The scenes at Oraibi would never become dim in her memory, and especially those which had occurred during the last two days.

Her probing of her feelings in the analysis she was somewhat fond of making of herself resulted in a complete reversion of her attitute towards Ross Van Shaw. She said to herself she dated that change of thought from his words and actions that morning, and especially on account of his brutal attempt to "get even," as he said, with Bauer. Even allowing a great deal for his action as due to his mental and physical condition, the whole thing, Helen now felt sure, was an indication of his general character. He had been caught for a little while off his guard, and in that time, Helen had seen him as he was. And the vision she had caught of his perverted heart and mind was not a pleasant vision. She even shuddered at herself as, with burning face, she recalled how near she had come, on such brief and slight acquaintance to giving herself to such a life, lured in great part by the glamour of that golden mirage into which so many of earth's brave and beautiful souls have hastened, only to find its sparkling waters to be nothing but dust and its promise of luscious delights of the senses, nothing but the dead sea fruit of bitter disappointment.

It should be said in all honest judgment of Helen's experiences at this time, that the girl's final rejection of all thought of Van Shaw (who, before she had reached Milton, passed out of her history), was due to more than the revulsion she felt over his words in the little stone house at Oraibi. It was due as much to her mother's counsel, and in fact, to the entire atmosphere of a healthy, happy home life which she had always known, and in which Esther had trusted for the final outcome of Helen's choices. So that what seemed to her at that time to be a sudden act due to an accidental revelation of character, was, as a matter of fact, due to a life-long training in a home which had established in the fibre of its whole system, underlying principles of right thinking and pure living.

When, a few days later, word came to Tolchaco that Ross Van Shaw had recovered sufficiently to be taken home and that he would probably suffer no permanent crippling from his fall, Helen found herself simply in a mild way glad to know the fact, but that was all, and Van Shaw faded out of her mind even more quickly than he had blossomed into it.

All through this first day's travel towards the mission, Felix Bauer was also going through some tumult of feeling over the events that had made history since the party had left the mission.

He was sore at heart over much that had taken place, and could not reconstruct his former image of Helen as at heart a maidenly, dignified girl, worthy of the most exalted worship. He said to himself that even after she must have known from her mother what Van Shaw was, she had gone to see him, to say good-bye, to encourage him, to —his mind could find no excuse for her and do what he would, he felt himself growing more and more distressed over it.

Mrs. Douglas was a very wise woman and Bauer's trouble did not escape her notice. She understood the reason for it, but it was only at the close of the day, during the preparations for the night camp, that she found an opportunity to speak to Bauer alone.

"Felix," she said, using his first name as she had begun to do of late, to Bauer's quiet pleasure, "I know what is troubling you now. But Helen did not go over to see Van Shaw of her own wish. She went because his mother came over and brought a request from him to see Helen. No, I don't think you need to know what was said there in our presence. It ought to be enough for you to know that I am quite sure Helen has passed the place of her infatuation, if indeed she has gone so far as to yield to such a feeling. I could not let you imagine that Helen was really lacking in real maidenly conduct."

Bauer's face shone with delight. "Oh, thank you, Mrs. Douglas! I have been doing her injustice all day. You have no idea how relieved I feel. And I have been sitting in judgment on everybody. Oh, if I were a monk now, like one of my ancestors, I would lash myself bloody. What a fool I must be to think I have a right to judge others as I have. And I have let hatred and malice and revenge creep into my soul at the thought of Van Shaw. I don't see how God can forgive me."

"He has forgiven a good many worse men than you, Felix," said Mrs. Douglas, smiling at him. "Don't lose any sleep over that."

Felix Bauer slept like a child that night and as his habit was he awakened early and as he sat up and saw the figure of Elijah Clifford kneeling out on the sand, the same thought of God's benignant presence occurred to him which the same sight had roused in him before. Clifford rose and came in to make the usual preparations for breakfast.

"I have been praying for Ansa. By this time the folks must have got there if the river is not in flood. We haven't had any runner bring bad news. I dont know what I'd do if Ansa should be taken. It would just about break Miss Gray's heart too. She thinks everything of that child. She says she is going to train her to be a great teacher for her people."

Bauer expressed his sympathy and asked if there was a good doctor to come over to the mission from Flagstaff.

"Yes. Or it's possible Doctor West will be there from Raymond. He sometimes pays us a visit about this time of the year. My! Wouldn't it be providential if he should come along for Ansa. And he could dissect you at the same time and like as not find out that your hemorrhages don't come from your lungs, and that you haven't got consumption any more than I have. The doctors sometimes make mistakes in their diagonses you know. Would you feel bad to learn that you didn't have tuberculosis after all?"

"I believe I would be able to bear the news if it was broken to me gently."

"But maybe Miss Helen wouldn't pity you so much, eh?"

"I don't want to be pitied."

Clifford looked up from his fire approvingly at Bauer.

"You're right, my son. Pity from a girl when you want something else from her is like apple pie minus the apple. It's pretty dry fodder. But say" Elijah abruptly changed the topic of talk, "What about Walter Douglas? He's a likely fellow, isn't he? Bound to make his mark, isn't he?"

Bauer stared a little, not knowing why Clifford was asking the question.

"Yes, Walter is going to surprise everyone with his talents one of these days."

"And he's a good fellow morally and all that I suppose?"

"He certainly is. I don't know a better. Anyone that has such a mother as Mrs. Douglas can't help being good."

Clifford was silent while he adjusted various utensils around the fire.

"Yes, Mrs. Douglas is an angel. Mr. Douglas will never have to buy an aeroplane for her. She's got her own wings. And some day they'll carry her right up to heaven." Then after another pause:

"How old is Walter?"

"Twenty-four."

"How old should you take Miss Gray to be?"

Bauer was surprised at the question.

"I don't know. I am a poor hand at guessing."

"I know, because she told me. She is twenty-eight. How old would you take me to be?"

"I have no idea."

"I'm just thirty next Thanksgiving. When I was born in Vermont thirty years ago turkeys were only eight cents a pound. Now they are twenty-six and we can't raise 'em out here at any price on account of the cost of feed. I'd give most anything for a good plateful of turkey with stuffing and fixin's. But there's lots of things in this world we can't have. We must learn to get along on mutton and pancakes and canned ginger bread. Such is life."

Jesse P. McKnight returned from a circuit of the globe to his congregation at Magnolia Avenue Church, Los Angeles, Calif. He reports a great experienee and says the church has prospered under the ministry of J. K. Shellenberger, who greatly endeared himself to the people.

Jacksonville, Ill., Sunday-school reports

969 present on Rally and Promotion Day recently. On Oct. 27 the church at Jacksonville, will celebrate the eightieth anniversary of its organization. Evangelist Herbert Yeuell will begin a meeting there Nov. 10. This church sends its pastor, Clyde Darsie, to the Louisville convention and provides for all his expense.

Marching to Zion.

The Sunday-school at Table Grove, Ill., devised and carried out a novel demonstration in connection with Rally and Promotion Day last Sunday. Three divisions formed in three parts of the town and marched toward the church. Division one and two meeting at a given point were joined by dicision three at a further point. Each division was properly manned by captain and lieutenant. A great day was enjoyed at the church. W. L. Hipsley is the efficient superintendent.

An Active Fruitful Two Years.

J. P. Myers, pastor Marion, Ind., church, reports some interesting facts. More than $11,600 has been paid on the church debt in the past two years and all current bills are paid up to date. A new pipe-organ has been installed and paid for. There have been over three hundred additions to the church in two years. Definite arrangements are being made to take care of all indebtedness within the next four years. These people have a fine new $35,000 house. About eight or ten delegates are going to the national convention at Louisville.

"All and Some Besides."

The "All or Nothing" campaign of Rockford, Ill., church in its endeavor to raise $10,000 as a minimum amount on which to proceed with the building of a new house of worship, resulted in "All and Some Besides." C. G. Kindred of Chicago, assisted Pastor W. B. Clemmer, preaching every evening for two weeks. Judging from the topics of the sermons and the enthusiastic appreciations in the local church calendar Mr. Kindred must have greatly pleased and blessed the Rockford congregation. Building operations will be begun at once.

Medical Missionaries to Confer.

The fifth annual meeting of the Medical Missionary Conference will be held at the Sanitarium, Battle Creek, Mich., beginning December 31, and holding over January 3. These conferences occupy a field by themselves, having for their chief object the encouragement of the medical branch of missionary work. A very cordial invitation is extended to all Christian missionaries to attend this conference, all members are to be entertained free for one week by the institution. Inquiries may be addressed to The Medical Missionary, Battle Creek, Mich.

Poster for Home Mission Week.

Twelve posters—22x28 inches—on American Social and Religious Conditions, dealing with the Negro, the Immigrant, the City Problem, Country Life, Economic Aspects of the Liquor Problem, the Growth of Socialism, etc., have been issued by the Home Mission Week Committee. These are intended, primarily, for use by the ministers, but the committee has a limited number of sets which they will be glad to send to those who can make special use of them in missionary societies, prayer-meetings, or young people's societies. Twenty cents in postage stamps sent to Charles Stelzle, 156 Fifth avenue, New York, will secure the posters as long as the supply lasts.

Morning Prayer at Louisville.

Arrangements have been made for a prayer service at Louisville in the Henry Watterson Hotel each morning beginning at 7:30. The auditorium is on the tenth floor and will hold about three hundred people. Such a service will help all the services of the week. The convention needs the guidance and help and blessing of God. Those who cannot attend the prayer service in the hotel can observe the Morning Watch in their own rooms. A card suggesting topics of prayer for each morning will be given out to the delegates. The Portland conventions were notable for their spiritual atmosphere. The place of meeting helped that spirit. If all will pray morning, noon, and evening, the Louisville Conventions will surpass the Portland conventions in spiritual power.

Pastorates Fit Up Close Together.

A happy fitting up of pastorates close together is about to take place at Bloomington, Ind. J. C. Todd, who resigned the pulpit last summer to become university pastor at the state university and incumbent of the Bible Chair there, has remained in the pulpit and will remain until his successor, William H. Smith of Harrodsburg, Ky., comes upon the field Nov. 1. The church has thus been continuously provided with leadership through the change of leaders. Mr. Smith is a Hiram College and Yale man receiving his A. M. and B. D. from the latter school. He has held pastorates in Ohio, Connecticut, Indiana and Kentucky. He is a preacher of remarkable strength. Mr. Todd expects to spend some time in the field in the financial interest of the Bible Chair, but hopes that its friends will be so prompt in their gifts that he may soon devote all his time to actual teaching and ministry.

An Effective Village Church.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, of First Church, Bloomington, preached the sermon for the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Christian church at Mackinaw, Ill. The attendance was so large that J. W. Street, the pastor, spoke to an overflow meeting in the Methodist church. The success of this rural congregation is notable in this day of the decadance of rural churches. Through the years this congregation has sought to be a real help to the people of the community. In every good work the members have wrought faithfully until today there is no community with higher moral ideals and doing more for its people than Mackinaw. The membership has maintained a gradual growth until it is now well toward the five hundred mark. The Sunday-school has adopted modern methods and stands well in front with other schools even in larger places. The average attendance for the year will register about 200. J. W. Street began his work in Mackinaw in 1906. He has dedicated his life to rural work and studies it and loves it. The old church building vacated three years ago was donated to the village for a Y. M. C. A. It is now remodeled and will be re-opened shortly for its new purpose.

An Error and a Tender Episode.

Prof. W. B. Taylor, of Bethany College, calls our attention to an error in this department when it was announced some weeks ago that he had accepted a call to the pastorate of New Castle, Pa., church. The basis of fact underlying our report is so interesting and tenderly beautiful that we give it to our readers in Professor Taylor's own words: "Before Thomas W. Phillips died he called the elders of the church to him and asked them to call me to the pastorate of the church and to keep me. In view of my love and respect for Brother Phillips this request touched me deeply. I visited the church and preached for them. I found it to be a very fine and promising work. They have a splendid property worth over $350,000. Their building has thirty-six separate rooms and will seat over 1,600 people. They have about 1,400 members. It is a delightful people and community. I refused to let the officers put my name before the congregation until I could decide whether I should accept it or not. I was never a candidate for the position only I have always tried to be willing to do the Master's will. After praying over the matter and upon the appeal of my present and former students I decided to remain here, and wrote to T. W. Phillips, Jr., that I felt it my work and my duty to continue to train workers for the kingdom of God."

Pastor Projects a Season's Program.

As an example of a preacher's making a program for himself a long time ahead the sermon themes of Dr. George H. Combs, of Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, are inspiring. For the entire season he has announced Sunday evening topics dealing with young men's life. They are no less admirable for their reach into the future than for their variety and suggestiveness. The dates and subjects are as follows:

October 6, "Breaking Home Ties;" October 13, "Getting a Start in Life;" October 20, "Is It Worth While to Win;" October 27, "Wearing Your Own Clothes;" November 3, "The Hard Pillow;" November 10, "Politics;" November 17, "Dollars;" November 24, "Is Success an Accident?" December 1, "Fighting Windmills;" December 8, "The Scaffolding of Manhood;" December 15, "Knowing What You Can Do;" December 22, a Christmas musical service; December 29, "The City Beneath the Sea;" January 5, "Rivers of Rubies;" January 12, "On Getting Married;" January 19, "On Staying Married;" January 26, "The Land of Anyhow;" February 2, "Yesterday;" February 9, "Today;" February 16, "Tomorrow;" February 23, "Losing Your Grip;" March 2, "Me;" March 9, "Others;" March 16, "The Lost Dream;" March 23, "False Lights;" March 30, "The Down and Outs;" April 6, "Clocks;" April 13, "The Secret of Charm;", April 20, "How to Hang Yourself;" April 27, "The Laughing Plant;" May 4, "Foundations;" May 11, "The Bared Head;" May 18, "The Rifted Lute;" May 25, "The Broken Sword."

Maryland Convention

The Disciples of Maryland, Deleware and the District of Columbia think their conventions are the best of all the states, and are sure the one just closed in Hagerstown is the best of the thirty-five they hawe held. In the representative delegations, the collections from the churches and on the field, the high standard of addresses, and the hospitality of the Hagerstown homes, a pace was set which Harlem Avenue, Baltimore, will find it hard to outstrip next year. The larger churches vie with each other for the best reports. This year Peter Ainslie's Christian Temple bore off the honors, having 101 additions, $20,057 raised for all purposes, and winning the Christian Endeavor banner. Ninth Street, Washington, reported 69 added and $10,175 raised, and took the Bible-school banner. Vermont Avenue, Washington, added fifty-eight with $13,000 raised. Twenty-fifth Street, Baltimore, won the Junior Christian Endeavor banner. The forty-two churches report a membership of 6,396; additions, 707; raised for state work, $1,728; home missions, $1,276; foreign missions, $1,295; total for all purposes, $66,552. The report of the state treasurer, D. C. W. Ward, was as follows: Balance, September 22, 1912, $468.87. Receipts from offerings, $4,415.69, from the estate of Jacob B. Thomas, $4,639.18; total, $9,523.74. W. S. Buchanan was emplayed for six months as general evangelist and eight mission churches were helped. Earle Wilfley was elected president and E. B. Bagby, of Baltimore, corresponding secretary.

E. B. Bagby.

evening of October 3 with a fellowship meeting. Local pastors of the west side of the city bore greetings from their respective churches. The splendid sentiment expressed by the good Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists was indicative of the fine spirit of fraternity which prevails among the churches of the city. Secretary M. D. Crackel brought greetings in behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association, Secretary E. R. Wright in behalf of the Federated Churches, and Judge F. A. Henry president of the Cleveland Disciples' Union in behalf of the Disciples.

The historical session on Friday was a real feast of reminiscent and prophetic utterances. Alanson Wilcox, now in his eightieth year, read a very carefully prepared address on "Seventy Years of History." Mr. Wilcox was pastor of the church from 1875 to 1879, during which time the present building was erected. Three members of the choir of 1855 were present, two of whom sang the same song which they sang in the church as bride and groom fifty-seven years ago. During the seventy years of history the church has taken into its fellowship 4,500 persons, established churches by contributing the nucleus from its own membership at Jennings Avenue, Highland Avenue, West Boulevard, and Lakewood, besides sending hundreds of well trained workers to the various parts of the states. In the last quarter of a century it has sent twelve young men into the ministry and one young lady, Mrs. Edna Kurtz Settlemyer, into the mission field. It is estimated that approximately one-half million dollars has passed through the various treasuries of of the church during its career.

Letters of greeting from the following ex-pastors were read: E. B. Bagby, Baltimore; Edgar D. Jones, Bloomington, Ill.; W. W. Sniff, Paris, Ill.; J. W. Allen, Spokane, Washington, and S. L. Darsie, Hollywood, California. Alanson Wilcox and James C. Cannon, the only other living ex-pastors were present in person. Lathrop Cooley, father of Hon. H. R. Cooley was the first pastor, and the following men who ministered to the church became college presidents: B. A. Hinsdale, J. M. Atwater, Silas E. Shepherd, W. S. Hayden, and James A. Garfield. The historical session closed with a prophetic address by Professor E. E. Snoddy, of Hiram College on "The Future of the Disciples of Christ."

Sunday morning was devoted to Homecoming and Roll-call. One living member, who as a child attended the first meetings of the church with his mother in the very beginning seventy years ago was present and participated in the communion service. Eighteen persons who were members in the old frame building arose when the roll of 1873 was called. The pastor spoke on "The Supremacy of the Church," and received new members into its fellowship at the close of the service. The evening was given to Community Interests, and Rev. R. H. Miller, of Buffalo, delivered the message on "The Duty and Opportunity of the City Church."

W. F. Rothenburger is now beginning the fifth year of his ministry with this historic church, with Miss Jennie Jenkinson as assistant. The people have a forward look and believe they are entering upon the greatest work of their history. The church seeks to serve the needs of the immediate community, and its doors are seldom closed. Besides sending young men into the ministry, it has long had a missionary conscience. M. D. Adams, of Bilaspur, India, has long been its living-link in the foreign field, C. M. Burkhart at Coshocton, Ohio, is the living-link in the home field, and Ernest Gordon at Mohoba, India, is supported by the Teachout family.

The Million in Hand

Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the Board of Church Extension.

Our receipts this year are $97,243.47, an increase over last year of $37,175.07. This is the best year in all our history. Including $39,158.61 interest, our new receipts are $136,402.08. This is the Lord's doing and it is marvelous in our eyes. Since October 1, enough money has been received to lift the fund to $1,009,175.79.

Offerings From the Churches.

The offerings from the churches this year amount to $24,881.61, a gain of $3,820.51 over last year. There were 1,210 contributing churches, an increase of 112. The most wholesome sign of growth of any work is the increased offerings from the churches because this money is raised by the missionary committees, the preachers and members of average financial ability.

Ninety Congregations Housed.

During the year loans were made aggregating $239,825.00 to ninety congregations. These ninety congregations raised for their buildings over $500,000. Therefore our loans called out over three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of property. Our total receipts from all sources were $257,001.62, including returned loans, and interest. It will be noted that practically all of this money was used in housing homeless churches. The Board did a quarter of a million dollars of business in church loans this year.

In addition to this 126 loans were promised, aggregating $332,450. The cash balance on September 30 was $46,862.64. This amount will not pay the loans that were promised but your Board has always granted more money than is shown in our balance because we depend upon future gifts and de-cause we depend upon future gifts and returns on loans to meet these obligations and many churches that are promised loans do not call for their money for a year or two.

Another item of interest is that eighty churches paid their loans in full this year, making 943 congregations that have paid their loans since the beginning. In returned loans and interest these churches paid back $1,352,757.32, which has gone out to help other homeless churches build.

The Board has helped 1,541 churches to build since the beginning in loans aggregating about $2,250,000. Only eleven churches have failed and sold their property, which speaks wonders for the vitality of our mission work in America.

It should be noted that we now have $1,009,175.79 in our Church Extension Fund. What are our plans for the future? With 1,900 homeless congregations among us your Board can do nothing else but ask the brethren for the second million dollars. Your Board confidently looks to you, our brethren, for future help and expresses its deep gratitude to all who have aided us, your servants, in the past. On behalf of the Board,

FLETCHER COWHERD, President,

Armageddon

By E. L. Powell.

and in voice of Sinaitic thunder, 'Thou shalt not steal.'

"If capital uses its powers corruptly to buy up congresses and churches and universities it has become the poison of the very fountains of justice; it has stopped the free exercise of the human mind in dealing with great moral convictions; it has made the statesman to speak as he has been paid; the professor to instruct as may be the will of the capitalist who is back of his support, and the faith of the church to rise and fall with the exigencies of real estate. Does not God care, the God of liberty, the God who created the minds of men to work out these great moral problems and the souls of men to hold such convictions as inalienable upon which no hand should be laid, liberty within the limitations imposed only by His own will and His own authority?

"God Will Share Protest."

"If capital shall be responsible through the refusal to pay a living wage for the tenement-house child laborer, responsible for the narrowing and imprisoning of human souls by treating those souls only as receptacles to receive the day's wage and having no other consideration than that which capital can offer, be assured, my friends, that God Almighty will share and inspire the protest, which may change suddenly from hate into revolution. Government must care for these human relationships, and the great day of the Lord will not have come, in all of its splendor and light, until the actual facts of life within the realm of justice shall be made to conform to the equity and the law of the kingdom of God; for fundamentally and essentially the kingdom of God is first justice.

This is Armageddon.

"I wish to conclude by saying that this present hour is an Armageddon in the theater in which it is being fought. What better battlefield than America? Here went forth the pronouncement which we call the Declaration of Independence. Here for the first time was sounded that high note of liberty—that high note of the democracy which declared that government exists for the benefit of the governed and not for the benefit of one man nor king nor a few men

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

nor nobles nor a company of men nor financial pirates. The tendency of modern development is toward all men rather than toward one man. To build up the marvels of antiquity the few led and the many followed, the few ruled and the many were driven. The toiler was not considered; he was built into the walls of cities; his blood outlined the boundaries of nations; his labor wrought the luxury of kings, but he himself had no civic existence.

"Here in America with its vast inland seas and its mighty prairies and its glorious mountains lifting the soul to the sky and toward God, here is a fitting battleground. We are to settle the question sooner or later, if not now, then tomorrow we are to settle it for the sake of the generations that are to follow and deliver ourselves once for all from that which concerns ourselves solely in the spirit of those ease-loving and laissez-faire citizens who cry out after us, 'The deluge, and what matters it?'

Battle for Mastery.

"We are fighting the battle as between man and the dollar, whether he shall be master of the dollar for the sake of service, or whether the dollar shall be master of him for the sake of oppression. We are to settle the question whether America is sufficiently advanced in moral development, in moral stature, to govern herself in harmony with the laws of truth and righteousness, and that means that until this America of ours shall co-operate with God in business and in government in all material concerns there shall be no chance for the fulfillment of her glorious destiny.

"May God stir up our hearts to fight this battle of today—this battle of the present hour. It is the battle for the Lord. It is our battle pre-eminently, for the very spirit of the Revolution was the enthronement of man and the subordinating of machinery as represented in those lines:

> "'Call the roll, Sergeant Time;
> Match the day, if you can;
> Waterloo was for Britons,
> Bunker Hill is for man.'

"Government for the sake of man, institutions for the sake of man, the church for the sake of man, religion for the sake of man—for is not man the only representative of God in His constitution and nature on this earth, for upon him has been stamped the divine image?

Marching Down.

"I conclude with these lines from Sir Edwin Arnold:

> Marching down to Armageddon—
> Brothers stout and strong!
> Let us cheer the way we tread on
> With a soldier's song!
> Faint we by the weary road,
> Or fall we in the rout,
> Dirge or paean, death or triumph—
> Let the song ring out!
> We are they who scorn the scorners—
> Love the lovers—hate
> None within the world's four corners—
> All must share our fate;
> We are they whose common banner
> Bears no badge or sign,
> Save the light which dyes it white—
> The hope that makes it shine.
> We are they whose bugle rings,
> That all the wars may cease;
> We are they who pay the kings
> Their cruel price for peace;
> We are they whose steadfast watchword
> Is what Christ did teach,
> "Each man for his brother first—
> And heaven, then, for each."

A Great and Popular Church Music Book

The New Praise Hymnal

Edited by Gilbert J. Ellis and J. H. Fillmore

There is no equipment of the church more vitally related to its spiritual development than the kind of hymnal it uses. A church makes no better investment than the purchase of a good hymnal. It is a serious mistake to buy an ordinary gospel song book for use on the Lord's Day and the Wednesday evening prayer services. Such books cheapen the worship.

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents about everything that is demanded today.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains also what is used by the most advanced churches.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in THE NEW PRAISE HYMNAL, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

A characteristic testimonial:

"We have just received the 240 copies of The New Praise Hymnal. I have placed 'The New Praise Hymnal' in all of the five churches which it has been my privilege to serve. Our people are delighted with the new books. They will contribute very much to the dignity of the service. Russell F. Thrapp, Los Angeles, Calif."

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the three years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that has even been offered to Sunday-schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., one of the most successful social service leaders of men and young men among the Disciples, thus writes concerning this series:

"I have used THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM with the Greyfriars Class since October, 1908—the first issue—and it is the only Sunday School help that is really worth while for adult classes. It has actually built visible, tangible things for this municipality."

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these clesses in the study of Social Reform.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

The Living Church

WHEN YOU enter it you hear a sound—a sound as of some mighty poem chanted. Listen long enough, and you will learn that it is made up of the beating of human hearts, of the nameless music of men's souls—that is, if you have ears. If you have eyes, you will presently see the church itself—a looming mystery of many shapes and shadows, leaping sheer from floor to dome. The work of no ordinary builder! The pillars of it go up like the brawny trunks of heroes; the sweet human flesh of men and women is molded about its bulwarks, strong, impregnable; the faces of little children laugh out from every corner stone; the terrible spans and arches of it are the joined hands of comrades; and up in the heights and spaces there are inscribed the numberless musings of all the dreamers of the world. It is yet building—building and built upon. Sometimes the work goes forword in deep darkness; sometimes in blinding light; now beneath the burden of unutterable anguish; now to the tune of a great laughter and heroic shoutings like the cry of thunder. Sometimes, in the silence of the night-time, one may hear the tiny hammerings of the comrades at work up in the dome—the comrades that have climbed ahead.

—CHARLES RANN KENNEDY, in "The Servant in the House."

Sweet Is That Power

Sweet is that power that bids us rise
Onward and upward throughout all time,
Seeking for truth and ignoring wrong,
Stemming the troublous tides along,
Which conquer we must or never climb
To things which the noble life comprise.

Soothing to think of that Beacon Light
Guiding our steps on this dark below
Slowly but certainly on toward the rays
Of promised brightness, through devious ways,
Enticing us e'er from the way we must go
To the kingdom of justice and right.

The initial step is our suffering here
To that Great Beyond where a fairer day
Greets the new comer with wondering eyes;
Knowing the promise, while here man tries
To live this life in a saintly way,
Patterned after the Savior dear.

Jesus, consummate of saintly life,
Pictures the value of noble deeds,
Proving that they make the last step slight
To the Heavenly Home from the earthly night,
Where ne'er a heart in sadness bleeds
In eternal life, where there is no strife.

Did it ever strike you that goodness is not merely a beautiful thing, but the beautiful thing, by far the most beautiful thing in the world? and that badness is not merely an ugly thing, but the ugliest thing in the world? So that nothing is to be compared for value with goodness; that riches, honor, power, pleasure, learning, the whole world and all in it are not worth having in comparison with being good; and the utterly best thing for a man is to be good, even though he were never rewarded for it; and the utterly worst thing for a man is to be bad, even though he were never punished for it.—Charles Kingsley.

The difference between a life without Christ and a life with Christ is the difference between ebb and flood—the one is growing emptier, and the other is growing fuller.—Charles Cuthbert Hall.

The Call of the Christ

The Chicago Daily News says: "Christ calls men to himself, and through vision, love and possession one grows on to likeness. Jesus is the living expression of God's life in terms of humanity, and he is the supreme manifestation of the normal humanity. His life is the one character most easy to reproduce. Christ's call is to intellect, heart and will, to rouse the best manhood of this age, and for it all the world, says the author, is waiting. This is an illuminating, hope bringing, strengthening work."

The Baptist Commonwealth says: "Only a few men could have written this masterly exposition of the character of Jesus. It is a work of striking power and reality—a vital, living, convincing portrayal. Scholarly, yet simple, philosophical yet understandable, original in phraseology yet lucid, a positive yet persuasive presentation of the claims of Christ. It will strengthen the faith of those in doubt, cheer the sorrowing, give courage to the fearful, bring hope to the despairing—in a word, impart to every reader a satisfactory and realistic vision of the Master."

The Watchman says: "People who have listened to Prof. Willett as a public speaker have been impressed by the clearness, simplicity and logic with which he expresses his ideas. The same characteristics appear in the volume under notice. It is a scholarly, philosophical and understandable presentation of a great theme."

Basic Truths of Christian Faith

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

From the Midst of the Convention

AT THIS TIME IT IS DIFFICULT TO make an adequate report of the great convention at Louisville in the midst of which this article is penned. The editor of The Christian Century, who is devoting his entire time during this week to the interpretation of the convention for the great daily newspaper, the Courier Journal, has asked me to set down, for this page, my impression of the convention.

We emerged yesterday from the most strained situation that has developed in one of our conventions in many years, and I find the impression made upon me by the session of Thursday afternoon in which Rev. J. B. Briney presented a resolution asking the Foreign Missionary Society to receive no more living-link funds from the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, and to recall Guy W. Sarvis from China, is more vivid at this moment than any other. That this resolution was defeated by a vote of 468 to 270 indicates plainly that the main body of the Disciples are attending diligently to the work to which they have committed themselves.

The Louisville convention is certain to become historic. During these days the words liberty and democracy have been frequently upon the lips of the multitude. There have been fears among us for our liberties, but where democracy holds sway and a just regard for the spirit of Christ, liberty can never be overthrown. Liberty has its perils; those who follow its light may find themselves confused at times; they may become discouraged as they essay to keep in the open paths; but liberty deals fairly with its friends, it has no pranks or deceptions to play upon them, and those who lean to that side, persevering in every task attempted in that great name, can never miss the object of their quest.

It is because of our inborn love of liberty that we are an inflammable people. All parties to our discussions are not more heresy-hating than they are liberty-loving. All schools of thinking may be willing to surrender doctrinal views, but they will never surrender the right of individual judgment, the liberty of prophesying, the privilege to think, and to be free—the bulwarks of Protestantism, the only standards which humanity will follow with enthusiasm.

Therefore, when the venerable J. B. Briney offered his resolution whose effect would be to constitute the Foreign Society a tribunal to pass upon the beliefs of those who contribute to its work, the tense interest displayed was a demonstration of the vitality with which the Disciples hold to that fundamental principle of individual liberty. Professor Ames, Guy W. Sarvis and Hyde Park Church were small figures on the canvas. The real issue, whether a few men should control the thought and the future of the Disciples, loomed up in comparison like a firmament. Our people are weary of newspaper ecclesiasticism or ecclesiasticism in any form and they dreaded the creation of another.

No man has been more active during his life-long ministry in assailing anything among us that looked like ecclesiasticism than J. B. Briney; and had his resolution been adopted he would have imposed upon the Disciples the very thing which he has professed to abhor. The questions involved were so tremendous that many felt that if Mr. Briney's resolution had prevailed, the day would not be long when mission boards would be tribunals for the arraignment of heretics rather than agencies for the conversion of the world. It must be evident that a system of doctrine would have to be adopted to which every church among us would be compelled to conform.

Who could devise such a system?

If one church is put on trial all churches must be; churches whose views are known could easily pass muster. But what of men and churches whose views are unknown? Are only the silent to be regarded as the sound? If so, we might well pray to be stricken dumb. Are we to emulate men who have the courage of their convictions and who are not afraid to speak out, or must we worship at the shrines of the timid, the time-serving and the dwellers in solitude? Were such a resolution to represent the convictions of our brotherhood, liberty of speech would perish, independence of action would become obsolete, and a race of spineless men would fill the schools of the prophets.

The Disciples are sensitive on questions of doctrine; they are rebellious when their liberties are assailed.

But while we have been disturbed over many questions of doctrine, we have done great things at home and abroad. Our controversial skill has given to some of our brethren a great field for the employment of their gifts, and our discussions have not been in vain. But, while these have been going on, the churches, as a whole, have been inspired to continue the ministry of Jesus in missionary, benevolent, philanthropic and evangelistic work.

The reports of the various boards showed an increase over all previous years. Of particular interest was the report of the "Million Dollar Campaign Committee," led by Abram E. Cory, of China, and his efficient co-workers. For upwards of a year these men have visited the churches from coast to coast asking gifts from our men and women of wealth. More than $700,000 has been pledged, and the million dollar mark is in sight. Mr. Cory and his helpers made inspiring addresses at one of the morning sessions of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society which was declared to be one of the greatest sessions of the entire convention.

Other reports are not in at this writing but their advance sheets are encouraging to every interest dear to the hearts of the Disciples.

Of the addresses I can give but a grief mention here. Hugh McLellan, by general consent gave the best convention sermon that we have had in years. It was classical in diction, convincing in argument, adequate in every line. Of course Peter Ainslie did his best, as he always does, and that best any man might well covet. Oliver W. Stewart, eloquent and convincing as ever, presented the claims of the Temperance Board. Charles S. Medbury made us feel the needs of deeper devotion to the work of our benevolences. W. F. Reagor from the Pacific Coast had a stirring message for world-wide evangelization; while Stephen J. Corey told of the miracles of missions that are being wrought on the Congo.

The Flight of Chicago's Vice Vultures.

It is a year and a half since the report of the Chicago Vice Commission was published. Its revelations of the astounding ramifications of unholy traffic in human flesh startled the entire nation. Nothing much has been done about the matter by the Chicago authorities until about a month ago, when the grand jury of Cook County started an investigation, and State's Attorney Wayman began to move against the red-light district in a manner which could not be mistaken. The vice commission, being an investigating, and not a judicial body, had obtained the larger part of its information upon the understanding that individual names and places should not be made public, and had designated these by a system of letters and numbers, the key being held by a small committee of four persons. One of the features of the present crusade has been the attempt of the state's attorney's office to secure this key for the purposes of prosecution, thus far without avail. Another feature of this crusade has been the legal action taken against the owners of houses used for immoral purposes. The entire city has been aroused as seldom before, and the prevailing sentiment is against segregation, which sentiment is in line with the recommendations of the vice commission. So thorough-going has been this crusade that fear has been expressed that the women of the levee would scatter throughout the residence districts. Recently, social workers, educators, and ministers addressed a mass-meeting at the Sunday Evening Club, Orchestra Hall. Dean W. T. Sumner said that it was a remarkabe commentary on the public spirit of American citizens that a traffic which could never be legalized should be left to the control of the police. "The condition of affairs is such that the people of this Christian city of Chicago should not stand for segregation of vice which can never settle any phase of the social evil, save to hide it from public view." Mr. Edward M. Skinner, former president of the Chicago Association of Commerce, said: If the segregated district is closed and its inmates driven out, your residence districts will not be endangered any more than your police permit it to be endangered. It is now eighteen months since the vice commission reported and urged the abolition of the segregated district and the appointment of a morals commission. Is the council as earnest as the members of the commission?" A prominent Baptist clergyman in a prelude to his Sunday evening sermon, spoke incisively upon the situation as follows: "The policy of police protecting these evils increase their number enormously. Segregation as aplied to this policy is a great misnomer. Incubation is the better term. A vice district is a breeding ground for these evils. The one man in this city at the present who can make effective this remarkable movement is the mayor. If he comes forward and supports this widespread, awakened Christian sentiment and gives unequivocal orders to the police department to suppress social orders, Chicago will be cleaner and safer and more attractive than over before in her history." It remains to be seen whether the Chicago red-light district, after it has been swept and garnished, will be left to become again worse than at the first. Certainly it has been many a year since public opinion was so thoroughly aroused for a morally clean city.

Better Laws for Family Relations.

Marriage bonds and regulations have become a national problem. This statement is axiomatic. Other problems less vital to the nation, which were once regarded as belonging to the jurisdiction of the states, have so run over state boundaries as to make federal action imperative. Witness, for example, the commercial conditions which have made necessary the federal interstate commerce laws. In that case the national law supplements that of the states. Every state in the union has some law regarding marriage and divorce. Some of the more progressive have regulations which would be effective in some measure were it not for poor laws or lax enforcement of others. What, then, can be done to better a condition which every thinking man or woman knows exists? If it is possible to supplement the state laws by national laws, then that course should be taken. The nature of the case, however, militates against this solution. It has often been suggested that federal control of the entire subject of marriage and divorce, insuring a uniformity of law and a maximum and equal enforcement, would eliminate many evils. Recently a large Methodist conference took decided action advocating such control. That was a bold step and will meet with much criticism, but only through such fearless action by conscientious Christian men and women can we hope to bring about a change. Perhaps the step indicated is too radical, but if it will set us to thinking out a better solution and stimulate us to action in putting that better solution into practice, it is well worth while.

Report of Committee on Social Service.

BY A. W. TAYLOR.

Your Committe on Social Service, appointed by the Portland Convention, begs leave to report as follows:

The social problems of our times are fundamentally moral problems. We believe it is the business of the church to permeate modern social movements with religious ideals and modern religious movements with a social passion. We believe:

1. That they will never be settled right until they are settled in the light of the teachings of Jesus; that the church of Christ is under obligation to take an active interest in the vital problems of poverty, industry, living conditions, temperance, divorce, immigration, rural life, peace and war and every social condition that involves the welfare of humanity; that her task is that of the common good and that in a social age she should be aggressively interested in the moral solution of social questions.

2. That the church cannot champion any class or partizan cause, but that she can create a fellow sympathy, cultivate a Christian conscience, arouse interest in all urgent social questions, and direct activities that will help to solve them.

3. That the church cannot adequately extend its influence and build up itself except as it meets these problems with Christian sympathy and helps to solve them by Christian activity under its own direction; that it is as much its duty to organize for social extension in this social age as it is to organize Sunday-schools and missionary societies or to direct any of its other multifarous useful activities.

Whereas;

The A. C. M. S. is the society organized by the Disciples of Christ, for the propagation of Christianity in America, this committee submits that under this society's auspices it finds a field already provided for it by the society's activities in such signal social undertakings as those of the Home Mission Survey of last winter, their study of the immigration problem and the present simultaneous Home Mission Campaign. The home societies of all the churches are taking a view of their task that is significant for social interests and in most of them there are already organized and at work social service agencies that are providing potential forces in the work of making America Christian. In the co-operation of these agencies, through the various home societies in the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council, and in other interdenominational activities, will be found one of the most powerful means for forwarding the union causes which we plead and in answering the Master's prayer that we may all be one "that the world may believe."

Therefore we recommend:

1. That the Committee on Social Service be made a standing committee of this convention; that it consist of five members, composed of men who are actively interested in social work, to be appointed by the convention upon recommendation of the secretaries of the A. C. M. S., and the president of the convention

2. That this committee of five select in their own way an advisory Council who shall act with them in council and co-operate with them in work.

3. That the A. C. M. S., appropriate the sum of $250 for the committee's work during the next twelve months, no part of this money to be spent for salary for any member of the committee, and all expenditures to be audited by the secretaries of the A. C. M. S.

4. That the program of the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches, be heartily approved and adopted as our own, and that we instruct our Committee on Social Service to co-operate in all feasible ways with the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council, and with the Social Service Committee and departments of other religious bodies in carrying out their common tasks.

5. Recognizing that a vast majority of our churches are in towns, villages, and country places, we direct this committee to give special attention to the problems of the country church.

6. Lastly, we recommend that this committee be given space for a special department in the American Home Missionary.

The Christian Attitude Toward Money

"Seek not proud riches," says Lord Bacon, "but such as thou mayest get justly, distributed cheerfully, and leave contentedly. Yet have no abstract or friarly contempt of them." "Give me neither property nor riches," says Agur. He recognizes the necessity of material possession and also their danger. The rich man is apt to become arrogant and to set himself above the moral law. But the poor man is tempted to steal and thus to profane the name of God.

"Cowries are men," runs the African proverb. We say, "Money makes the man." It is not possible to separate a man from his possessions. We judge him by what he creates. By creating wealth he renders himself worthy of our commendation. But men often control wealth which they have not helped to create. Great possessions are not always evidence of unusual services.

It is a common error to look upon material possessions as the only object worthy of serious endeavor. The Christian can avoid this error by opening his eyes to social values. It is worth while to have a reputation for fair dealing and to deserve it. Not all the wealth of the world is sufficient recompense for the loss of integrity. The independence that riches give is a poor substitute for spiritual freedom.

"Some, having nothing, pretend to be rich, Others, being wealthy, pretend to be poor."

There are doubtless many reasons why some poor men pretend to be rich. They crave social recognition and they know of no other way to get it. Being nothing themselves, they try to have the world believe they have the title to property that should receive consideration. The seek the opportunity to prey upon others, to live without work, and that opportunity is more likely to come if they are believed to be wealthy. The rich man has his reasons for pretending to have nothing. The assessor may be troublesome. The church and the college have needs. There are orphans to educate and helpless old people to support. In the presence of so many human needs it is inconvenient to be rich.

No Christian despises maney. He tries to get all of it he can get honestly. He will not sell his soul for it, he will not sell his friends. Money is only a means. To make it the supreme good is to degrade man. When it is gained by honest labor and used wisely and generously it is a means of grace. "Make all you can, save all you can, give all you can," was the advice of John Wesley. It was Dr. Johnson's opinion that a "man who both spends and saves money is the happiest man, because he has both enjoyments." Of his own experience he says, "When I was running about the town a very poor fellow, I was a great arguer for the advantages of poverty; but I was, at the same time, very sorry to be poor." "Sir, all the arguments which are brought to represent poverty as no evil, show it to be evidently a great evil."

It is the love of money and not money itself that is a root of all kinds of evil. The money for which we have toiled represents life. To rob us of it is to rob us of life. The Christian will use his influence and his vote to protect the wage earners in the enjoyment of their money. He will strive to educate children so that they will desire what is best and know how to spend their money for what enriches life. The saloon and other institutions that take money and give in return misery cannot have the support of intelligent Christian men. Loan sharks, thieves who masquerade as real estate agents, and all other pretended friends of the people whose real purpose is robbery, should find that in the sight of the law they are enemies of mankind. We have done only a part of our duty when we have exhorted everybody to be industrious and thrifty. We must take care of the fellow who starts out to live by the sweat of other men's faces.

The generosity that consists in spending the money of others is frequently met. The grocer and the butcher have borne the expense of many a banquet for which their customers were praised. One preacher, always prompt to send flowers to the sick and distressed, never bothered himself about paying the florist. Some men spend liberally with their friends' money that properly belongs to their wives and children. The proverb, "The borrower is servant to the lender," does not cover all cases, for some borrowers never pay back what they borrow and they seem to have money for luxuries, which the lender cannot buy.

An Echo of the Men and Religion Movement

In Denver there is no disposition to allow the effects of recent reforms to die. Those who have felt the inspiration of the great moral movements in that city are ever at work to deepen whatever of good has resulted. If the Men and Religion Forward Movement had done nothing more than to emphasize the need of practical service by putting Christian men at the front of all effort which makes for better civic condtitions, it would have achieved a worthy end. The perseverance of the sinners can only be successfully met by the perseverance of the saints, and the quality shown by the Christian manhood of Denver is being amply rewarded, as shown by the following from the Congregationalist:

It is stimulating to observe that on the surface, at least, Denver is not succumbing to that fatal weakness which often attacks a municipality just coming out of the fever of a reform uprising—namely, letting down after the election. A number of indications show that her citizens mean the good work to go steadily forward. The police department, under Commissioner George Creel, has been setting up a number of reforms, some of them revolutionary. The other day he issued an order requiring all officers to surrender their clubs—and Denver is now patroled by policemen unaccompanied by "big sticks." This advanced stand has naturally drawn a varied reception, although prevailingly favorable. Rev. A. A. Tanner of First Congregational Church, in a sermon on "How God Corrects Us," took occasion to commend the new rule, declaring that his observation of a similar policy under "Golden Rule" Jones of Toledo, showed nothing of which to be apprehensive in the way of lawlessness. Another projected reform, heartily endorsed by Mr. Tanner, was the plan to establish a correctional farm in place of the squalid conditions of the local jail. Speaking on the same day in First Presbyterian Church, Harry G. Fisher, energetic young head of the Christian Citizenship Union, attacked the vice problem. As has been previously explained on this page, the Denver reform administration has settled for the present upon the policy of restriction rather than annihilation in dealing with the social evil. The Men and Religion campaign left behind it a strong sentiment in favor of a vice commission—similar to those in Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and elsewhere—and Mr. Fisher gave notice that Mayor Arnold would surely be called upon to redeem his campaign pledges in this respect. Not far away, in Central Presbyterian Church, the evening service was devoted to the first of a series of civic meetings planned to be continued fortnightly through fall and winter. There a judge, the city treasurer and the sheriff were preaching to a large congregation on three such sermon themes as "The Love of Christ Practically Applied," "The Christian's Politics" and "The Church and Law Enforcement." All these signs of a true civic awakening must rejoice the heart of doughty little Ben Lindsey, the "kids' judge," who fought for years while others slept.

To admire what is admirable, to adore what is adorable, to follow what is noble, to remember any such examples that has crossed our earthly pilgrimage that have brightened its darkness and cheered its dullness, this keeps alive before us the ideal of human nature and the essence of the divine nature. The good thoughts, the good deeds, the good memories, of those who have been the salt and the light of the earth, do not perish with their departure. They live on still, and those who have wrought them live in them.—Selected.

Our Friends Who Work in the Dark

By Daisy Winifred Heath

Of the 5,000 blind in Illinois about four-fifths have lost their sight in adult life. They have not had the advantage of the special training and sympathetic care which the state has long provided the blind children, who comprise only one-fifth of the total number of blind. The neglect of the needs of this large majority of adult blind came to the attention of certain members of the Chicago Woman's Club, and about five years ago they undertook some relief of the situation. They provided the most obvious necessities for a few of the blind of Chicago who were living in abject poverty, and also undertook the instruction of some in tactile reading and writing and certain industrial occupations by which they could assist themselves financially. Arrangements were made with one of the Chicago department stores for the sale of goods made by the blind, and this work is still carried on under the auspices of the club.

To do the teaching, they employed a bright young blind man, Mr. Charles E. Comstock, son of one of the traveling auditors of the Illinois Central Railroad. Having lost his own sight at the age of eight, and receiving the most serviceable sort of education at the state school for the blind at Jacksonville, Mr. Comstock well understood the needs of his sightless brothers and sisters, and strongly sympathized with those who had been thrust into darkness after reaching maturity.

He began his work by teaching the reading and writing of embossed type—taking up a point print (American Braille) with some; with others, the Moon type, an embossed line lettering similar to our printed capitals, but somewhat simplified, and easier than Braille for the aged or those whose fingers are hardened with toil.

Later he took up the teaching of loom weaving, and reed and raffia and bead work. He mastered typewriting, studied the systems of stenography in use by the sighted and worked out a system of Braille shorthand, devising a practical shorthand machine. He now began teaching his Braille shorthand, in connection with typewriting, to such pupils as were capable of becoming proficient stenographers.

One of the early pupils was deaf as well as blind. Mr. Comstock made himself familiar with the manual alphabet so that he could spell out his instructions into the man's hand, and taught him to weave. While not wholly self-supporting, this doubly afflicted young man is now able to earn enough to provide himself with clothing and spending money, and takes pride and keen pleasure in his work.

A bright but despondent blind woman, with whom a sighted teacher in another state had been able to accomplish nothing, later moved to Chicago and was visited by Mr. Comstock. When he first put a page of Braille into her hands, she exclaimed:

"I can't ever learn that. Why, I couldn't make anything of all those little dots if I had a dozen eyes."

"Oh, yes, you can, Mrs. D.," was the instant response. "You are going to learn it. I am here to teach you."

And she did learn it, stimulated both by the excellent teaching and by the desire not to be outdone by this blind boy (he was barely twenty then). Not only that, but she mastered the Braille music, which is much more difficult, and doubly so to one who had been familiar with the staff music used by the sighted.

One unfortunate woman, who, by reason of paralysis, is unable to walk or talk, besides being blind, was given instruction, and has found much consolation in whiling away the long hours by typewriting and reading embossed type books.

Extension of Home Teaching Work.

A bill asking for a state appropriation for the extension of this home teaching work was introduced by Senator William M. Brown at the late session of the Illinois legislature, and became a law. Ten thousand dollars was appropriated for the work for the next two years, and Mr. Comstock was appointed superintendent of this new state department of visitation and instruction of the adult blind. He has three assistant teachers in different parts of the state, Mr. Bryant M. Harrod, who has his headquarters in East St. Louis, Mr. J. Finley Lockaby, whose territory centers in Peoria, and Miss Anna J. Johnson, who teaches in parts of Chicago and in several near-by towns. Superintendent Comstock has his headquarters in Chicago and teaches here when not engaged in supervising his assistants, in ordering and distributing supplies, or in writing letters or holding interviews relating to the work of his department. An exact record is kept of the work done by each instructor and of the history and progress of each pupil. The work is under the Illinois board of administration and is carried on in accordance with the regulations of the state civil service commission, and has the cordial approval and coöperation of both these bodies and of the governor.

All the teachers are totally blind. Superintendent Comstock is convinced from his own broad experience and observation that more effective work can be done by blind than by sighted teachers in instructing the blind, because the sightless teacher best understands the peculiar needs of pupils similarly afflicted, and because he is better able to arouse the confidence of his pupils by showing them, through his own achievements, what can be accomplished without sight.

Subjects which are now being taught the adult blind of the state are the reading and writing of embossed type, Braille music, Braille shorthand, typewriting, net and hammock making, mattress making, basketry, chair caning, rug weaving on the Danish loom, knitting, crocheting, sewing, and bead work.

The pupils are in all walks of life. One of the Peoria pupils is an active and successful electrical contractor, attending to the office part of the work himself, and employing several men to do the wiring of buildings. This gentleman finds the Braille writing of especial value, Mr. Lockaby says, as "people often come into his office and leave before his stenographer arrives, which necessitates his remembering the addresses, but having his thoughts concentrated upon making an estimate on a proposition, the address is sometimes forgotten. The use of the Braille writer overcomes this difficulty."

Another Peoria man, seventy-five years old, has made remarkable progress for a man of his age. With five lessons in reed work he has completed his first basket, and, as a product of the first effort, the article would reflect credit upon a person of any age. Since he lost his sight two years ago, this man has learned to operate the typewriter so well that he writes all of his letters, and has also written his recollections of experiences as a soldier in the Civil War.

One of the stenographic pupils, a young woman who is a graduate of the University of Chicago, is now doing stenographic work for one of the university professors.

A lady and gentleman of Glen Ellyn, a couple who have been married about forty years, have both recently lost their sight, yet they are perhaps the happiest of any of the pupils. The man has taken up the industrial work, while his wife is learning to read, and reads to her husband while he is at work on his baskets.

Many are already deriving financial benefit from their industrial instruction under the new department, some having made and sold a number of articles—sold because they are worth the price, not from sympathy.

The preceding instances give some indication of the advantages of the work to blind people under widely differing conditions and circumstances. As Helen Keller has said: "The heaviest burden of the blind is not blindness, but idleness, and they can be relieved of this greater burden." To some, the work of the new department furnishes employment to the mind and diverts the thoughts from their misfortune, thus tending to avoid mental stagnation, and disperse gloom and despondency. Others see that it will make an appreciable addition to their income. To the few who have previously been successful in their undertakings it has facilitated the transaction of business. In the case of the wretchedly poor, it also means, in so far as they can be lifted out of pauperism, a great saving to the state, out of all proportion to the expense of their instruction.

Yet, while the department is doing vigorous work and is making notable progress in the herculean task before it, there is great need for the hearty coöperation of all in sympathy with work for the sightless, in many directions, especially in finding employment for those already equipped for work and those now being equipped, and in the purchase of goods made by the blind. It is not always easy to find a sufficient market for the products of the blind worker's toil, and the securing of positions outside of their homes is even more difficult. The business world is hard to convince of the capabilities of the sightless, and many of those able to do valuable work are still left in idleness.

The Desire for Independence.

The desire of the self-respecting blind for independence is clearly indicated by the following extract from a letter written by a blind young woman in response to the offer of friends to do what they could to assist her and a few other efficient young women to find employment. She says: "We certainly all appreciate the kindness of you and your friends, in offering to help us to help ourselves. Few understand that this is the kind of aid that we desire; almost all are willing to give us assistance, but think we should be willing to be taken care of. This is not what most of us want—we want a chance to live, as other people live. This is human nature; and where this desire for independence does not exist there is something vitally wrong."

Relief from enforced idleness is, undoubtedly, of more importance than anything else to the happiness of the sightless. Yet the old adage, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," is as true of the blind as of the seeing. Hence another field in which friends of the blind can be of use to them is the social field. Many blind men and women are terribly lonely. Shut off from many of the activities and diversions of the seeing, they prize highly social intercourse with their fellowmen. Why should they not have this gratification? They cannot take the initiative socially, we must seek them out. Our neglect to do this is often our loss as well as theirs.

Many of the blind, by reason of abundant, though unwelcome, leisure, are deep thinkers; a blind man's memory is usually, of necessity, exceptionally well-trained and is often a rich storehouse of valuable and interesting facts; a large proportion of blind people are skilled musicians, for a sightless person with any taste for music will naturally give it much attention, since it is the chief æsthetic avenue open to him. There are at least as large a proportion of intelligent, gifted blind people as of sighted. Denied the newspaper and magazine except as friends find time to read these to them, they value the companionship which enables them to keep up with the times, and are ready to share their intellectual or musical riches with us in exchange for this boon. Why, then, should they be, as they often are, practically ostracised, regarded merely as curiosities to be exclaimed over if they do anything without help, or else as invalids, or a strange, abnormal type of human being, with no interests in common with the rest of mankind? The blind are just like other people, save for the handicap of lack of sight. There are many brave and cheerful and inspiring souls among them, many bright and interesting minds. They are, as a rule, so appreciative of little efforts to give them pleasure—to talk with them, read to them, walk or skate or play or sing with them—that any effort is well repaid.

A sightless person can be given much pleasure by being persistently included in the various social activities of his neighbors—church and other meetings, entertainments, socials, picnics. Lectures, concerts, plays, trolley-car rides, walks in the parks, are within easy reach if one will take a little trouble.

Association With Blind Not Depressing.

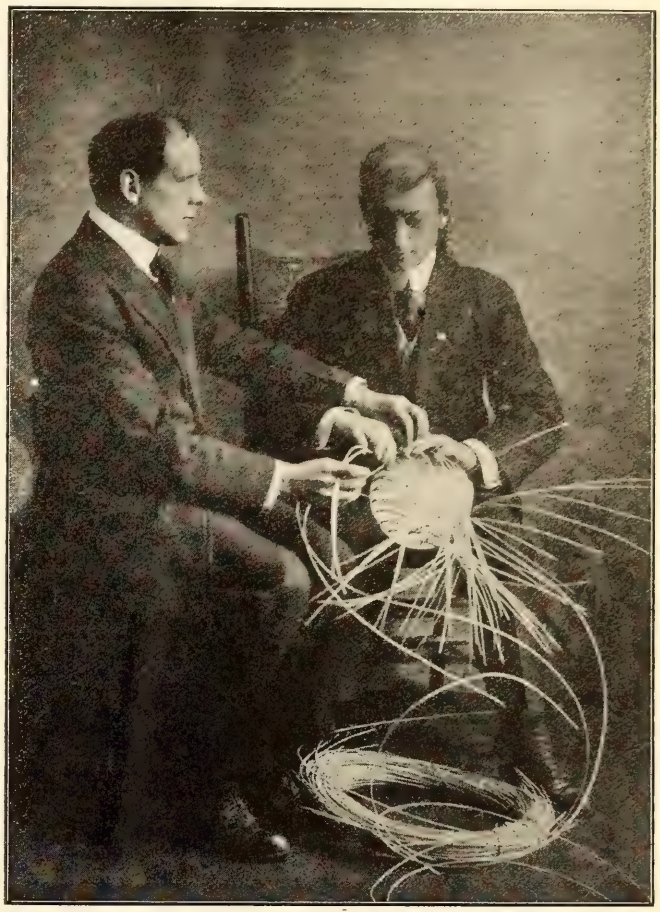
Some people have the mistaken idea that blindness and gloom are inseparable. The writer has heard such expressions as the following: "I feel so sorry for blind people that I know I could never endure being with those so afflicted. I should find it too depressing." A sympathy that expresses itself by depriving its object of what would give him great pleasure and tend to decrease the need for pity is not true sympathy. Moreover, association with the blind is not necessarily depressing. Those not isolated from their sighted fellows usually come in contact with the better side of human nature, and in this way are less blind to the good really existing in the world than many who have eyes, for, after all, the instinct of kindness prevails. A large proportion of the blind are optimists. Some day the world will wake up to the fact that many of those who sit in physical darkness are themselves light-bearers, shedding intellectual and spiritual sunshine on a whole community if not forced to keep their light hidden under a bushel.

Perhaps a few definite suggestions may be grateful to any who would like to be of assistance to our sightless brothers and sisters. What seems to be most needed at present is coöperation:

By the employment of blind piano tuners, and of blind stenographers.

By purchasing goods made by blind workers. There is a section in Rothschild's department store, Chicago, where these goods are sold, without profit to the firm. A larger patronage of this department would be helpful.

By giving orders to blind workers for chair caning, hammock making, any desired kind of basket, crocheted articles, etc., which can be made by the blind, but which may not happen to be found among the goods displayed at Rothschild's.



Superintendent Comstock Giving Lessons in Basketry to a Blind Pupil.

By spending a little time occasionally with some blind person, reading to him or otherwise bringing him information and activities for which sight is requisite.

Critical thoughts and words are usually unloving. Therefore such criticism is poisonous—always to the one who expresses it, and often to the one who bears it. But it is so popular! Try to live one day without speaking a critical word, or thinking a critical thought, of any human being, and see if the habit of criticism has not been popular with you. Test it as you listen to the conversation of others—but don't criticize them if you find it is popular with them! Love them out of it instead. Only love will crowd criticism out of ourselves. And we need to be cleansed and purged of it wholly, completely, and forever. It is so subtle, so inviting, so spontaneous, so attractive, so devilish, and so deadly. Our sin-habituated natures are so shot through and through with this poison that only a miracle of change can help us. Christ will work the change. When he is overwhelming us with his infilling presence, we do not poisonously criticize: we cleansingly love.—Sunday-school Times.

Heaven is like the life of Jesus with all the conflict of human sin left out. Heaven is like the feeding of the multitude in the wilderness with everybody sure to get ample to eat. Heaven is like the woman sinner from the street who bathed the feet of Jesus in her tears and wiped them with her hair. I do not want to know more than that. It is peace, joy, victory, triumph. It is life. It is love. It is tireless work, faithful and unselfish service going on forever. The way to achieve all this is to try to follow Christ today, tomorrow, and the day after through prayer and right living.—Henry Van Dyke.

His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love.

The "Peril" of the Immigrant

By Charles Stelzle

When a million or more immigrants come to America during a single year it makes most people wonder what is to become of our country, but the "peril of the immigrant" is for the most part a phantasy of the imagination. In spite of the fact that immigrants have been coming to America in such large numbers in recent years, it is interesting to note that the percentage of foreign born living in the United States at any one time has not materially changed since 1860. Following are some figures: In 1860 the percentage of foreigners in the United States was 13.2 per cent; in 1870 14.4 per cent; in 1880 13.3 per cent; in 1890 14.8 per cent; in 1900 13.7 per cent; in 1910 14.7 per cent. The constant percentage, therefore, is about 14.

During some years more than half as many immigrants returned to the fatherland as came to America. The condition of the labor market in America determines the number of foreigners that come and go, so that immigration is in a constant state of flux. The foreigner not only takes care of himself by returning to his native land during a time of industrial depression, where he can live more cheaply, but he also relieves the labor market of congestion which might result in great harm to the American worker.

Immigrants Earn What They Take Back.

It has sometimes been declared with considerable feeling that the immigrant comes here merely for the purpose of making what is to him a small fortune and then returns to his own country, remaining there to spend this money; but, in the first place, he has honestly earned whatever he takes with him and has left more than its equivalent, and he has a right to do with it as he pleases. This is more than can be said of some Americans who go to foreign lands and spend small fortunes among an alien people.

But what about these immigrants? Are they a peril? Dr. Edward A. Steiner, who knows more about the human side of the immigration problem than any other man in America, recently declared that 5,000 strong-limbed, healthy-bodied immigrants landing at Ellis Island are more resourceful than as many average college graduates would be—and Steiner knows, for he is a college professor. They come to us, most of these immigrants, after their own countries have paid the cost of their education. They are ready to take up their day's work the moment they land on our American shore. We are often concerned about what we term the "new immigration," but Robert Watchorn, for several years commissioner of immigration at Ellis Island, once remarked: "If you give the Italian, the Hungarian and the Russian Jew half a chance, he will make the English and the Irish look like 30 cents." Presumably Mr. Watchorn knew what he was talking about, for he has studied literally millions of immigrants.

Careful Inspection Rigidly Enforced.

In the early days there was no careful inspection of the immigrant. Many of them came to this country feeble or diseased, with the result that comparatively soon they became a burden upon our charities and unquestionably affected the health of the community through contagious diseases. But this is not the case today. The steamship companies are too heavily fined in case they transport an undesirable immigrant, so that they are usually careful in their inspection.

It is true that many of the immigrants are illiterate. Possibly 25 per cent of the persons fourteen years of age or over who come to us can neither read nor write. Most of these come from the small towns or rural districts where the educational facilities are not as good as they are in the city, but it should be remembered that the most undesirable—that is, the criminal—classes among Europeans come from the cities and are usually the best educated. The test of literacy is not by any means the best one in our selection of the immigrant.

Should Offer Inducements to Remain Here.

If the immigrant who makes a few thousand dollars in this country and returns with it is worth keeping in America, we should offer him the right kind of inducements to remain here. As a matter of fact, we stack him in shacks, we exploit him in our economic life, and we do not always give him a man's chance. He should be made to see the advantage of remaining in America after he has become a useful citizen.

But family relationships, the spare cash deposited in foreign savings banks, the pleading for loyalty on the part of the government, the constant inducement offered by the steamship companies and the natural love of the fatherland which exists in the heart of every patriot—all these have a tendency to pull them back. But suppose that the immigrant does return to the fatherland. He goes to tell of the greatness and the glory of America, and so it often happens that when the returned immigrant finds that the conditions which first drove him out have remained unchanged, back he comes, the leader of a band which also seeks its fortune in this wonderland where a man may earn four times as much as he earned at home; where women are honored as they are in no other part of the world; where even the rights of little children are respected. Here they find religious and political freedom, a chance to make the most of themselves and economic liberty such as they never knew before.

America's Moral Responsibility.

Settling principally in large cities and influenced by segregative tendencies, they form their "Ghettos," their "Little Italys," their "Bohemian Hills," often retaining their old country social ideas and customs. Coming from lands where their privileges have been restricted, they become an easy prey to agitators. Sometimes the false economic doctrines accepted abroad influence their relationships in America. Purchased and led to the polls by corrupt politicians, they become a menace to the well-being of our country. But in spite of all this, the average foreigner will make a good citizen if the American will show him how. The real "peril" is in the American. A foreigner not yet naturalized wrote to friends in the fatherland: "America is a great country. They not only allow you to vote, but they pay you for voting." Who was responsible for such a situation?

It is the children of the foreigner who are our greatest peril, and they have received their training in this country. The criminal classes are largely augmented from among these children of respectable, hard-working foreigners. Any movement which seeks to help these children should be heartily supported. After all, it resolves itself into a question of neighborliness. Quit calling them "dagoes" and "sheenies" and "hunkies," and stop thinking of the foreigner as a problem. How would you like to be a "problem?" Think of the foreigner as a brother. This will help immensely on both sides.

Rome's New Tack

By Mark Wayne Williams

I have just discovered a new move of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to capture Protestanism. I relate my experience and ask your counsel. Monday I attended the Baptist state convention at Berlin, Wisconsin, not with any idea of converting anybody, but of having fellowship with the ministers in their association meetings. Their banquet was served within the walls of the new granite Catholic Church of St. Joseph.

Astonished at Announcement.

A gasp of astonishment greeted the announcement of the place and meeting. Some good followers of Roger Williams and Dr. Clifford refused to attend any such function held in the very precincts of the archenemy of Protestantism. For myself, I am an ostrich, and I went resolutely to the feast. But as I went, I wondered. What new wile of Antichrist is here? What machination from the papacy seeks thus to entrap the most violent of all Protestant sects against her claims? What subtle and diabolical cunning is this, by which Rome would take from us that only remaining method by which Christian manhood nowadays can express its undying loyalty to religion, namely, a seventy-five cent banquet?

Thought of St. Bartholomew's.

I shuddered as I thought of St. Bartholomew's massacre. Could it be while these innocent and ardent Baptist clergymen were Christianly engaged in stuffing themselves to the glory of God, that the bottled up wrath of the Papal power would throttle them, with a biscuit, or stab them with a fish knife, or poison them with succulent oysters and creamy coffee? O, that I had the "Menace" to advise me, and a few honest Orangemen outside to rush in and rescue me just before the dessert. I recalled the Inquisition, and what awful roasts and stakes were the repast for Protestants. I remembered that prison cell at The Hague, where with the savoury smell of the kitchen wafted artfully to his nostrils, the victim was slowly starved to death.

A Table in Hell's Vestibule.

With other trembling recruits, in number scarcely forty, heroes all of them, we entered the vestibule of hell and sat down to a sumptuous table. Flowers lured us with color and fragrance, music waltzed along the piano keys, beautiful and gracious ladies waited on our needs with siren smile and voice. The welcome, the evident hospitality, were not bought by the price of the ticket. Very vividly at first, but fainter and more faint the ghosts of Luther, Calvin, Knox, Huss, Zwingle, Hooper, Latimer, Ridley, Anne Askew passed before my bewildered mind. I beheld the fires of Smithfield, but I munched the delicious meats and salads; I remembered the Waldensians, but helped myself to a second portion of scalloped oysters; I viewed the starvation of Leyden and the Dutch towns, and sipped my ice cream. I lost the sense of personal danger; I did not look for the ground glass in my coffee cup, but recklessly accepted another filling at the friendly persuasion of one of our kind hostesses.

Toasts on Fellowship.

When the toasts began, I could see the Circean effect of the repast on the speakers. Their subject was "Fellowship." None of them had ever before eaten in the house of the Philistine. But, and here was the flaming peril of the whole thing, he was not merely astounded but gratified, to have had this hospitality in such a place and from such people. I had just been perusing Dr. Harry Guinness's book on Revelation, in which he establishes to the entire satisfaction of every trusting Baptist soul that Rome is the Scarlet Woman seated on the Beast with ten heads. And we alas, were eating her salt, guests at her table, and so condoners of all her iniquity.

New Edible Casuistry.

How subtle is this new edible casuistry! What the Jesuits of the pulpit could not accomplish these lady Jesuits of the table had effected with ease. Rome, the eternal, who could not, for all her power, conquer Protestantism by auto de fes, by theologic thunders, by political strategy, by all the arts of music, painting and architecture, by wealth and by supreme efficiency of organization, has conquered by the art of cookery. Where the mystery of the mass failed, the mystery of the palate prevailed.

The Son of Man—Delivered Up

A Sermon by G. Campbell Morgan

"The Son of Man is delivered up to be crucified."—Matthew 26:2.

The first thirty verses of this chapter are characterized by contrast, by conflict; and yet by a strange and arresting co-operation. We are in the vestibule of the Holy Place of the sacrifice of the ages. The air is heavy with the electric sense of approaching storm. Yet it seems so still, and clear, that we hear and see acutely, and things commonly veiled are startlingly revealed as we read these wonderful words. Let us attempt then reverently to listen and to watch. Our theme is the story of the whole paragraph, the key-note is that of the text. In these words of our Lord, spoken to his disciples, we have his introductory declaration to everything that was now to follow in the mission of the King. Let us first examine the words, and then the whole scene in their light.

It is well that we should remind ourselves in the first place of the occasion upon which our Lord uttered these particular words. Matthew is careful to tell us, "It came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these words." The declaration followed immediately upon the Olivet prophecy which is recorded for us in chapters twenty-four and twenty-five of this particular Gospel. When Jesus uttered the prophecy on Olivet, he was rejected by his own nation and he had rejected them. Solemn words had passed his lips: "The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." A sad and awful wail had passed those self-same lips: "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." He was strangely alone. A group of men were gathered round about him; his own disciples, those whom, having loved, he loved unto the end; and that in spite of their failure to understand him. But they were unenlightened, were entirely unable to apprehend the profoundest passion of his heart, or the things that he was saying to them. There he sat upon Olivet's slope, outside the city of his love, surrounded by a few men utterly unable to come near to him in the deepest and profoundest things of his spiritual life.

A Far Look.

And yet I pray you observe his dignity, his authority, the glory of his outlook, the assurance of his words, the unfaltering courage and confidence of every sentence that he uttered. He was looking on, far beyond the immediate surroundings; his glance encompassing the centuries that lay ahead, and the millenniums. He had been thinking of the ages yet to come in the economy of God for this world; and as he uttered his prophecy we are amazed at the clarity of his vision; but more amazed at his assumption of authority, and his absolute certainty of victory. He speaks of things immediate; and then of things nigh at hand, of the destruction of Jerusalem and strange experiences through which friends and foes alike would pass in the coming days; until at last, in a passage which, if I may reverently say such a thing of the Lord, was characterized by singular majesty and beauty of diction, he drew a picture of all nations being gathered before him, and he alone the arbitrator of their destinies, finding his verdicts, passing his sentences.

Having uttered his prophecy, suddenly, startlingly, he recalled them to the thing he had been speaking of through all those months, but with a new emphasis; declaring no longer that it is necessary that these things should be, but that the hour had come. "The Son of Man is delivered up to be crucified."

He Was Free.

Now as a matter of fact, at the moment when he said this he was perfectly free; I speak entirely within the limitations of the moment, and the human—he could have escaped. He was not arrested. It would have been perfectly easy for him to do what his disciples had urged him to do again and yet again; in the quiet silence of the night he might have left Jerusalem. It is perfectly true, as we shall see, that men everywhere were plotting for his arrest, that one of his own number was in the intrigue, but at the moment he was not arrested, he was free.

The difficulty had been recognized by expositors, and I find that one has suggested that he used the present tense for the future; and another that he used the full relative present, as though he had said, "The Son of Man is being delivered up." But you will immediately see that all this is gratuitous. He said, "The Son of Man is delivered up;" and I abide by the thing he said, that which was simply and actually true at the moment when he said it. As yet not apprehended, as yet not within the final meshes that were being woven around him by his enemies, he saw all the future clearly, and he spoke with quiet, calm assurance. Speaking first within the terms of a calendar with which they were familiar, he said, "Ye know that after two days the passover cometh," and then, "the Son of Man is delivered up." That was the statement of One who spoke in that eternal present which was the tense of his deepest nature and his profoundest life. That was the statement of One who had already said to his enemies, "Before Abraham was, I am," thus putting into contrast the past tense of the founder of the nation with the ever-present tense of his own consciousness; and claiming that his own abiding consciousness antedated the past experience of the founder.

The Eternal Present.

And yet it is perfectly evident that our Lord was now drawing their attention to the fact that the actual crucifixion was imminent. That was the accommodation of the eternal present of his own consciousness, to the tenses of their consciousness. He spoke to them because the eternal was merging into the temporal; that which was abidingly true in his own consciousness, from the standpoint to which we shall come in a moment, was now about to become patently, observantly, historically true. In that declaration he indicated to them the fact that the deliverance which was the initiation of their own national history, and of which the passover was but a shadow, was about to be fulfilled. This was no mere passing intuition, foretelling something that was about to happen. It was a profound declaration that the thing which is, in the divine economy, was now to become visible in human history. "The Son of Man is delivered up."

Compelling Love.

It was language which revealed the voluntary nature of the sacrifice of the Son of God. It was language expressive of the great volition; it was language that defied all the attempts that his enemies were making to arrest him! In effect, he who sat in the heavens laughed, and had in derision the men who were set against his anointed! And the laughter and derision of God were born of the fact that through the processes of their opposition he was marching to their salvation, and to their ultimate redemption!

There came a day when his great apostle to the Gentiles wrote these words, "Who loved me, and gave himself up for me." The word there rendered "gave" is the same Greek word as the word here translated "delivered up." He loved me, and delivered up himself for me. He was delivered, not by Judas, not by the priests, not by the rulers, not by the Roman procurator; but by the infinite, overwhelming, all-compelling passion of the heart of God.

Thus the little incidents of time and space, and of human calendars and almanacs are lost; and in the vestibule of the Holy Place of the sacrifice of the ages, we hear the Master say, "The Son of Man is delivered up to be crucified."

Reverently we now turn back to the whole paragraph, that we may survey the scene or scenes in the light of that declaration.

Strange Co-operation.

If we watch, I think that the first matter to impress us—let me put it from the standpoint of personal experience—the first matter that has impressed my soul in the reading of this paragraph is that of the wonderfully strange co-operation that is manifest. God in himself and through his Son is seen moving toward the cross; the Son declaring that he is delivered to be crucified; according to a Pentecostal interpretation, the Son delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. On the other hand, Satan in himself and through his children, through those to whom Jesus had but recently said, "Ye are of your father the devil," who "was a murderer from the beginning," and "a liar, and the father thereof,"—Satan, through his children, moving toward the cross, determined that it should be erected, plotting for it. Then, back in those earlier days, Mary at Bethany preparing him for his burial; with the keen intuition of the heart of a woman, seeing the shadows upon his face more clearly than others saw, desiring to do something that would tell him she saw and understood, breaking all the bonds of prudence as she poured the spikenard upon feet and head, preparing him, as he said, for his burial. Judas going to the priest, saying, "What will you give me;" plotting for his death.

The Strangest Conflict.

Now, is not all this in itself strange and arresting? Heaven, and earth, and hell, all at work against each other, toward one end and purpose. The strangest of all conflicts, and yet the most marvelous of all co-operations. God, in the person of his son moving toward the cross, arranging for it; Satan expressing himself through his emissaries, moving toward the cross, arranging for it; Mary sweet and tender lover of the Lord, anointing him for burial; Judas, base, a master traitor, sacrificing his Lord for thirty pieces of silver. God and Satan, Mary and Judas, co-operating toward the cross. It is the wonder of all wonders; one of the most amazing pictures in the New Testament!

At All Costs.

What is the divine intention? As God in his Son moves toward the cross, my enquiry may be answered by the simplest of all statements, but verily there is none better. The divine intention is at all costs to save men. What was the intention of Satan as he moved toward the cross? It was the intention at all costs to destroy the Savior. Thus we see two opposing purposes of the universe concerning humanity, moving to the same goal, but with an entirely different intention. God set upon saving men at all costs; Satan set upon the destruction of the Savior.

When I come into the realm of that which is more visible and more patent, I have again a striking revelation of conflict of method. Jesus said, "In two days is the passover, and the Son of Man is delivered up to be crucified." The priests and the elders said, "Not at the feast, lest there be an uproar among the people." Notice the conflict of method, in what it reveals of the underlying principles and purposes. Begin with the priests. "Not at the feast." Why not? It was the language of temporizing policy; we mean to kill him, but we must be careful; not at the feast; there will be an uproar! There you have a revelation of the whole genius of that which is common in government and authority; the whole genius of that which renders a people distressed, scattered, undone; the whole genius of that against which Jesus himself had flung himself with almost relentless fury in his teaching. "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." That is the genius of all false government; a policy which temporizes is affected only by the temporal concerns and temporal interests.

Contrasts.

Over against that is the language of Jesus, the voice of God. "At the passover." And why at the passover? Because in all his appointments of feasts and fasts, of ceremonies and rituals, in the ancient economy, there had been profound and eternal significance; and now with the finest delicacy of fulfillment, God kisses his symbol into actuality; and the actual, ultimate, final passover in human history shall be accomplished at the hour of the passover among the people to which it had symbolized things yet to be. On the one hand, the mastery of eternal principle; on the other subservience to temporal policy.

But there is one more contrast. I leave the first paragraph and the second, which chronologically is first, and I come to the passover itself, and to the feast. And I ask you in all quietness and solemnity, and I shall use as few words as I know how to look at the contrast. Behold Judas at the passover; and Jesus at the passover.

Incarnate evil sitting as a guest receiving the hospitality of Jesus, while all the time in possession of the blood-money of the Son of God; maintaining hypocrisy to the end by asking, "Rabbi, is it I?" That defies exposition.

Incarnate love, sitting with the betrayer, suddenly breaking out in thanksgiving, in prospect of the suffering which should make possible the saving even of Judas, if Judas will but trust him. That is the ultimate contrast of the scene.

The Conflict.

Let our final thought center upon the conflict. God, determined upon the cross in order to the saving of men; Satan, determined upon the cross in order to the destruction of the Savior! My question seems almost irreverent—I pause, and yet I must put it. Who won? If Christ rose not, then I am of all men most pitiable. If Christ rose not, God failed, and Satan won. I greet you! He rose; and I cannot end this meditation in the vestibule, save as I recognize that there flashes back upon it all the light of the resurrection morning. And by that sign and token I know that God won!

Ah! how those words follow me. Some of my nearest friends will be tired of hearing me repeat them, but I cannot help it;

"The death grapple in the darkness,
'Twixt old systems and the Word!"

In that conflict it was the Word which was victorious; and not the old systems. There sin and grace came to grips, and not grace destroyed; but sin. The victory was with the Son of God.

More Than History.

All this is more than history. "The Son of Man is delivered up," not at this moment, on this day of our calendar, delivered up by sin to death, in order that sin may live; but delivered up by God to death in order that sin may die, and men may live. What shall I do with this death? Shall I trust it, or shall I spurn it? Upon my answer to that question will depend—because I have heard the evangel, because I have stood under the shadow of his cross—upon my answer to that will depend my relation to God through the ages that are to come.

Then be it mine to say, so help me God, so help me God,

I take, Oh cross! thy shadow
For my abiding place;
Content to let the world go by,
To know no gain or loss;
My sinful self, my only shame,
My glory all the cross.

Congregational Singing

A Plea for the Average Man

By C. Silvester Horne

In the British Congregationalist.

As the weather-bound holiday-maker, with no music but the minor melody of the rain upon the windows, my thoughts turned to the new hymnal which is rumored to be nearing completion, and which will dominate Congregationalism for the next generation. That the book will be admirable is guaranteed by the names of the committee. I had better say at once that I am in no secrets. Let me say further that I have no sort of qualification to be a critic. I write this as a humble representative of the average person. Experience has convinced me that his tastes are mine. He likes a good "sing." So do I. He likes tunes that are singable by other people than those who are qualified for membership of the choir. He likes hymns that are understandable, and so do I. He is not a morbid, introspective person with an unhealthy interest in the anatomy of his soul, and, anyhow, spiritual anatomy would not strike him as a good subject for poetry. He goes to church principally to learn to forget himself and think of God and his fellows.

Like the Primitive Christians.

He is very near in feeling to the primitive Christians who were exhorted to encourage one another in hymns and spiritual songs. His songs will not be about himself, for he does not think himself a very good theme to inspire worship. He wants to realize God, and to be inspired for His service. Will our hymns carry him out of himself, and strengthen him in religious imagination and aspiration? That is the main question about the new hymn-book.

The average person is not gifted with exceptional fastidiousness. There are, no doubt, refinements of theological thought and musical expression which give sincere pleasure to the theological and musical elect. Something, no doubt, is due to these rare souls. We are anxious that they should have a sense of hospitality when they come among us, and if we can provide for their edification, why not? But I feel that they must not set the standard if the great body of our people is to find in the new book a vehicle of worship. Speaking for my clients, I beg the committee to remember our simple and crude musical taste. For myself, whenever any speaker refers in eloquent terms to Bach I make a point of applauding him.

The Experts.

The experts have told me what I ought to like, and shall a mere novice such as I am presume to doubt their judgment? But in weak moments I have confessed to friends that Bach bores me to distraction, and that I occasionally yearn for "something resembling an air." Fine music is all very well, but I would rather dethrone every choir in Christendom than deprive the average worshipper of his privilege of making a joyful noise in a tune that has been sanctified by generations of humble singers who are as innocent of Grieg and Berlioz as I am.

Music That Compels.

The finest effects in worship are produced not by choral but by congregational singing, and we want music, not that discourages the unmusical, but that compels us to join in by the indefinable magic of a great tune over the souls of the people. Particularly is this the case, if I may say so, where we are dealing with hymns that have become classics. Once in a generation some one may be inspired to write a new and worthy setting for one of these famous lyrics. But our present hymnal sinned grievously in insulting the majesty of some of the greatest of all hymns by wedding them to utterly unequal tunes. If "Rock of Ages" is the greatest hymn in the language, I should suppose "God moves in a mysterious way" would come second; and is there any conceivable defense of setting the latter to one of the least suitable of Dr. Dykes' tunes? In twenty years I have not felt justified in giving it out more than once, and even then we sang it with the emotion suitable to a "regrettable necessity."

Murdering Old Hymns.

It was not lack of fine, old tunes that drove the compilers of the present hymnal to commit this species of murder. For how many old tunes of merit and power they rejected! Neither its choral beauty—had they never heard it sung, say, in a great Continental cathedral?—nor the historic interest of its composition availed to secure a place for "Innocents." "Mariners" no lon-

MRS. JIMMIE—AND JIMMIE

AN EXCERPT FROM REAL LIFE.

"Jimmie, dear." The bright sweetness of Mrs. Jimmie's voice was a bit dimmed by sleep. "Jimmie, dear, that's the seven o'clock whistle. You won't mind if I don't get up for breakfast? I have a wee bit of a headache and I simply must go to Mrs. James' luncheon, this afternoon. You are a dear, good husband. There are plenty of eggs and some fresh doughnuts in the jar under the pantry shelf. Oh, I wish you would dress Randolph before you go down.

"Randolph, dear, come to mamma a minute. You can run over and play with Jeanette this morning if you would like to. He can go as far as the tracks with you, Jimmie. Come, and love me just a minute, both of you. There, now, run along. O Jimmie, you wouldn't mind 'phoning for the groceries when you go down stairs? The list is right on the top of the 'phone."

Jimmie took Randolph's hand, leading him out, and closed the door softly. Mrs. Jimmie tucked her dimpled hand under her cheek and, with a contented little sigh as of duty well done, drifted off into dreamland again.

An hour later she was roused by the hurried closing of the front door. "Oh, I'm afraid Jimmie's late again," she groaned. "It does seem to take him so long to get off. I can't understand why, but he probably mislaid his dreadful bag of briefs again. If any man ever needed a wife to take care of him, it's Jimmie Brandon. I hope he didn't forget Mrs. Peters' grapefruit when he 'phoned." And Mrs. Jimmie settled down again for "forty winks."

When at last she and the grapefruit appeared at old Mrs. Peters' door, the wrinkled face of that sufferer brightened perceptibly.

"Well, dear little Auntie Peters, how are you this morning? No, I mustn't sit down. See what I've brought. Can't I fix it for you? No, I can't sit down. Think of it, I only this minute got up! Am I not lazy? I don't suppose you ever had breakfast after seven o'clock. Well, just a minute till your daughter comes back. Jimmie got his own breakfast this morning, and you know how the pantry must look. I didn't dare peep in for fear I would want to fix it up and wouldn't get over here."

She laid a caressing hand on Mrs. Peters. "Did you have a good night?" she asked sympathetically. "I'm so glad. You know I haven't been sleeping very well lately. This hot weather seems to make Randolph so restless. You know he sleeps in our room on the cot. Every time he turns over he wakes me up. It's a mother's way, I suppose, to rouse at the first sound. So Jimmie made me move right into the spare bedroom. Isn't he a dear, good husband?

"Isn't it dreadful about Harry Sheffield? Have you noticed how many men here in town, just about forty, have gone to pieces lately? Harry was thirty-eight and Will Graves was forty-four and John Drake was just about the same age. It's been a lesson to me. You know Jimmie is just thirty-nine. I can hardly sleep for worrying. I simply don't let Jimmie do a thing about the house now. I think when a man has worked all day as hard as he does at the office he ought to relax when he gets home, don't you?

"I'm going to have Jimmie sleep outdoors. He is screening in the upper porch now at odd times. It's hard to get him at it—he seems just to want to drop down in a chair when he gets home. But think how nice it will be for him when it's done! I've always wanted to sleep outdoors. I tell Jimmie it will add ten years to his life.

"Poor Harry Sheffield! I should think Mrs. Sheffield would feel terribly. She told me herself that they had given a dinner every Sunday since they were married and seldom had less than twelve at the table. She's never had a maid, you know. When I asked her how she managed it, she said that they worked Saturday night after Harry came home from the store, and Sunday morning they set the table and had everything ready before church time; for Harry wouldn't miss church. Sunday night, after everybody was gone, they did up the dishes together and they never went to bed, she said, till everything was in perfect order again, for they always got out the washing Monday morning before Harry went down-town. I couldn't help thinking when I heard of his death that maybe if they hadn't entertained so much he would have lived longer. We wives have such a dreadful responsibility these days, when there is such a high tension in business.

"It was just the same with John Drake. Out of office hours there was always the garden, and Mrs. Drake would follow him around to get him to work. Of course men are like that—Jimmie always likes me around when he does anything. Besides, you have to watch him. He gets to thinking of some old law case, and this spring, though I was right at his elbow, up came a root of phlox. But Mrs. Drake never gave him a moment's rest. Then they ate in the kitchen a lot to save her steps. That isn't exactly restful to a man. Do you think so?

"Dear, dear! There is Jimmie and I haven't a single thing started for dinner. Fortunately I have a dozen bananas. Jimmie is perfectly happy when he can have all the bananas and cream he wants. If he likes them I suppose they are good for him. I think a simple diet is better anyway for all of us now that it is warm weather."

She dropped another kiss on Mrs. Peters' forehead and tripped to the door.

"Jimmie, O Jimmie!" She waved gayly and Jimmie turned back to her. She slipped a caressing small hand through his arm and gave it a playful squeeze. "Don't you want to go and get Randolph? There, we'll go together. It will be like a wee honeymoon trip, won't it? Think what I am going to give you for dinner! Bananas and cream! Mrs. Mayhew sent over a cup of the most delicious cream.

"Randolph, Randolph! I'm afraid he's inside. I hope he isn't troubling Mrs. Greely. Why, Randolph, did Auntie Greely invite you to dinner? You'd better come home. Well, dear, yes, you may stay just this once, if Mrs. Greely is quite sure you are not in the way. But be sure you come home by five o'clock. Mrs. Greely will tell you when it's time. Here, give mamma a kiss. Be a good boy.

"You blessed lady," Mrs. Jimmie turned to Mrs. Greely with a seraphic smile, "I always feel so safe when I know he is over here, but I am sure I don't see how you can stand all the children. I never could. I'm too nervous. I suppose it's all in getting used to it; and it is different when you have several of your own—one more doesn't make any difference. That's the only comfort I have when I let Randolph come over. They all seem to have such a good time and I can hardly keep Randolph away. Well, this boy must have his dinner." She patted Jimmie's hand.

"Oh, Jimmie! it isn't almost one? How time does fly, and I must be at that luncheon at three. Run out, dear, and get the bananas and the cream—they're on the top shelf of the refrigerator. It will save time to sit right down at the kitchen table. You don't mind if we don't have a tablecloth, do you? Since you put on this new piece of zinc I've just been dying to eat on it. Isn't it comfy? It seems just like the first day we moved in here. Do you remember how tired we were?

"What! must you go? Oh, that tiresome old case! Why should a man want to see you just at dinner time? I'm afraid you haven't eaten slowly. Ellen Graves told me that was what killed Will. You must be good to yourself for your little wifie's sake." Mrs. Jimmie stood on the top step of the porch and blew him a kiss. "Don't you want to turn on the hose as you go past? It'll only take a minute. Be good to my boy and don't get too tired."

About half-past six that evening Mrs. Jimmie came up the hill, daintily holding her filmy white skirts away from the dusty walk.

"Why, Jimmie, are you here? Um, we had such a good luncheon, I thought I should never want to eat again today, but mamma noticed how tired I was, as I came past from Mrs. James', and she made me come in and lie down for an hour, and now I am as hungry as ever. Let's sit down on the steps just a moment before we go in. Is my boy tired?" She touched his forehead with her small, gloved hand. "You mustn't go to overdoing and breaking the heart of your little girl. There, I'm going to sit right here. Put your foot down and let me lean on you—no, that way. Now I'm all right and comfortable.

"I'm so glad our house fronts the east, because I never get tired of these sunset afterglows. It's lovelier than even the western view. And just see that glorious harvest moon come sliding out of the purple haze down the valley. It makes me think of that summer before we were married when we used to walk out to the bluff to watch her come up. Now we are just old married people and sit still. Do you mind being old and married?" She drew his face down and kissed it. It was rather awkward for Jimmie, but he liked it nevertheless.

"Well, I suppose we must have supper," she went on in a moment. "I tell you what, you run out into the garden and see whether there isn't some good green corn while I go and change my dress. You'd better husk it out there, and maybe you'd better dig a hill of potatoes. Wash them at the hydrant. Oh, yes, you might feed the chickens, too. It will be nice to get the chores done early, then we'll have a half hour to work on the porch-screening. But maybe tonight we had better mend the cellar door."

Jimmie was just coming in with the corn and potatoes as Mrs. Jimmie appeared in a pretty tan house-gown, buttoning on an apron.

"Oh, aren't they too lovely for anything! While I put on the water for them, don't you want to run out and get the bedding? It was so sunny that I thought the blankets ought to be aired. You can carry them right upstairs, dear. And when you get down again, you'd better 'phone to Mrs. Greely's and tell her to send Randolph home. She looked this noon as if she had a headache, and this is the third day in succession that Randolph has been there from morning to night. It would be dreadful for me, if I did not know he was so well taken care of. He's probably had his supper. That's just like dear Mrs. Greely.

"I think I'll do the dishes while the vegetables are cooking. You see I haven't had a moment's time since the Gays were here for dinner yesterday and there's a shocking lot of them. Oh, are you going to help? What a dear man you are! I tell you, while I'm getting enough to pay to rinse, you could empty the pan under the refrigerator. I noticed it was running over before I went to Mrs. James', but I had on my best dress and couldn't attend to it. My, a house is such a responsibility! A man never realizes it."—Exchange.

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

It seemed to Bauer that Clifford was a little sober over his philosophy. But during the day he was jolly and high-spirited, keeping the whole company at concert pitch with his stories and fun. But through it all ran a thread of sombre hue as the thought of Ansa obtruded.

When the river was reached the party anxiously scanned its muddy stretch to see if it was too high to ford. Big rains had come down from the mountains during their absence from the mission and the banks were pressing full. Elijah, however, thought it safe to make the ford, and after a somewhat exciting and perilous passage they got across and by night of that day were at the mission where they were joyfully welcomed by the mission workers and the news that Dr. West had come in two days before, and had declared Ansa out of danger and rapidly recovering. After supper Mr. and Mrs. Masters, Miss Clifford, Miss Gray and Elijah, the Douglases and Bauer, and Dr. West met in the school-room and held a Thanksgiving service. The last thing that night that Bauer was conscious of was the memory of Elijah Clifford's prayer. He had never heard anything to equal it for tenderness and exaltation of feeling.

The Douglases were to leave for Milton in three days. The last day of their stay at the mission Helen was sitting on the old cottonwood log by the river when Miss Gray came down and sat by her, going over some of the desert experiences.

After a while Helen said: "We have not had any opportunity to talk over the matter I mentioned at Oraibi. I don't think it's necessary now."

Miss Gray looked very much pleased.

"I am more than relieved to hear you say that. If I had thought there was any danger to you—I would have warned you—I did not realize that there was any—"

"There was, for a little while," Helen said in a low voice, not looking up. "It has passed."

"Anything I could say now would only revive a painful memory. Only, I feel as if out of justice to what your mother may have said to you I ought to confirm it. Helen—if you had come to such an impossible act as becoming the wife of Ross Van Shaw, it would have been the ruin of your life. I must say this—Van Shaw was engaged to my sister during his first year at Burrton. She is remarkably like you in many ways—a great lover of wealth and luxury. Van Shaw broke her heart by his conduct. Let us not say any more. I did not mean to say this much." Miss Gray exhibited an agitation that Helen had never seen in her before. "You need not fear for me any more," Helen said earnestly. "I begin to see more and more the danger I was in. I am thankful to escape."

She began to tell Miss Gray about the meeting between Mrs. Van Shaw and Bauer. That led naturally to enthusiastic comments on the bravery of Bauer and Clifford.

"Your brother Walter said when he left for Milton the day of our arrival here that he would have given anything to have had the courage to do what Bauer did."

"It seems to me that Mr. Clifford was just as brave."

"Yes, only he insists that he had a lantern and that he was greatly helped when he got down on the ledge by having the lantern to brace his feet against. Did you ever see anyone so absurd or so—brave—as Elijah Clifford?"

"No, unless it is yourself."

Miss Gray blushed.

"I am not brave. I am a coward in many ways. Why, I am down here because I delight to do this work. It is no cross for me. And—in other ways I am a coward. And—I am very proud. Tell me, Helen, do you think of Elijah Clifford as—as an illiterate man? Does he seem to you like—like an ignorant person?"

Helen was astonished at the question and could not help noticing her friend's embarrassment.

"No. It has always seemed to me that Mr. Clifford was a remarkably intelligent and refined character for one who had never had a college education. I would never think of him as illiterate or ignorant. He uses beautiful language. I have never heard such English as he uses in his prayers. And he is a good linguist. I heard Mr. Masters say only this morning that he didn't know what he would do without Clifford's help in translation."

Miss Gray looked pleased, but her face glowed in anticipation of what she was about to say.

"Helen, I am going to confide in you. There is no one here at the mission I want to share with me in this and—and—I feel as if I wanted to talk with you about it. Mr. Clifford has asked me two different times to be his wife, and each time I have refused. And each time it was not because I did not respect and admire him, but because I thought I did not love him and most of all because I felt superior to him in education. I have been to college. It seemed to me as if I should be marrying beneath my rank if I were to be his wife. Do you think I should?"

"Should what? Be his wife?"

Lucy Gray blushed and laughed.

"You know what I meant. Should I make a mistake in marrying him or does it seem to you that I should run the risk of being disappointed in him all the time simply because I am college bred and he is not?"

"No," said Helen frankly. "I believe Mr. Clifford is the kind of man to satisfy you in that respect. He is studying all the time. I believe he can almost read Hermann and Dorothea now." Helen said it with a significant emphasis which made Miss Gray blush again. And then she added—"Lucy, you said you thought you did not love him and that was the reason you said no. Have you changed your mind?"

"Yes. Oh, I can't help myself! Let me tell you. That night at Oraibi when I first knew that Elijah had gone down there to rescue Bauer and Van Shaw I learned how much he meant to me. I believe I would have gone there myself if Mr. Masters and your father had not been quick-witted enough to take the rope the workmen had left out there by the great rock cistern, the first one in all Oraibi. When the three men were pulled up you remember Mr. Clifford was the last. I know that I pulled with the others, but I believe I never thought of either Bauer or Van Shaw. All I cared for was Elijah. I blistered my hands, see!" She opened her palms for Helen to look. "But I never told anyone. And even when he was telling that night about it, I seemed to see him slipping, slipping over that horrible ledge and I just couldn't help actually putting out my hand to draw him back. They say that college graduate young women don't know how to fall in love and that they don't get married because young men are afraid of them, they are so prim and intellectual and superior, but, oh, Helen, I am almost ready to propose to Elijah myself. I love him so much. Isn't that dreadful for a schoolma'am and a college graduate, and especially after she has refused him twice? What would he say?"

"I think he would say yes," replied Helen, delighted to be the confidant in this desert romance.

"I didn't mean that. I mean what would he say if he knew what I had been confessing to you? I would lose his respect."

"And gain his love," laughed Helen. "Lucy, I don't believe it is all hopeless. And you don't need to fear that you are too intellectually superior to Mr. Clifford. After you are married you will find that he will go on developing mentally."

"He is my superior now in nearly every true thing," said Miss Gray. The blush was still on her cheek and the love-light in her eye. At that moment she was recalled to the mission building by one of the children. As she left Helen she said to her, "I trust you respect my confidence."

Helen sat on the old cottonwood, her eyes on the river, her thoughts musing over her friend's story. She was so absorbed in it that she did not notice Bauer until he was near the end of the log.

"Oh!" she said a little nervously and then quickly, "Won't you sit down? This seems to be the only seat in the park."

Bauer sat down gravely and Helen asked him politely how he was feeling.

Bauer's face lightened so that for a second he looked almost handsome.

"That is partly what I came down to tell you. Doctor West has given me a very careful examination. He says my hemorrhages are not permanent. There is no reason, he says, why I may not entirely recover, even to the extent of going back to school again.

"Will you go back soon?"

"No, he advises me to stay here this winter. I can help Mr. Masters with the trading, handling the rugs that are sold for profit for the mission work. I begin to feel quite strong again."

He sat there silently watching the thick, muddy flow of the stream. His face in repose was almost stern. Helen glanced at it timidly and could hardly realize that she was sitting so near to a real hero, one who had risked his life to save an enemy.

"I haven't ever told you, Mr. Bauer, what admiration I feel for your act that night. I think it was the most courageous thing I ever knew."

Bauer turned his head and looked full at her. His eyes were, as Helen had once said, the most splendid she had ever seen. This time they looked at her with a calm sadness that compelled her own to waver and finally to drop.

"Loben ist nicht lieben," repeated Bauer. firmly. It was the nearest he had ever come to declaring himself, in words. And Helen was the most deficient girl, Walter always said, when it came to languages. She did not know German and did not care to learn. Miss Gray had laughed at her more than once on account of her obtuseness. So Helen now, with some heightened color, said as she raised her eyes.

"What does that mean?"

"Loben ist nicht Lieben," repeated Bauer.

"Won't you translate it?" asked Helen petulantly. "You know I never understood German."

"I—can't," said Bauer. And to Helen's surprise, he abruptly got up and walked away.

"Loben ist nicht lieben," she softly murmured. "I'll ask Lucy what it means. But he needn't have gone so. He has no manners. I do not think he is nice."

That night after supper she found Miss Gray alone in the school-room.

"Lucy, what does this German mean. As near as I can pronounce it, it sounds like this. 'Loben ist nicht lieben"?

"Say it again."

Helen repeated the sentence.

"Oh! Why, it sounds like 'praising is not loving.' Where did you hear it?"

"Oh, I heard it. I wondered what it meant. You know I don't care for German."

"Nor for the German?" Miss Gray ventured.

Henry Pearce Atkins has resigned as pastor of the Allen Avenue Church, Richmond, Va., to accept a call extended to him by the Broad Street Church, Columbus, O., succeeding H. Newton Miller, who resigned several months ago.

The sessions of the state conference of charities and correction are being held in First Church, Springfield, Ill., this week. A number of other child welfare organizations are holding their annual meetings in conjunction with it.

The annual convention of the Mississippi churches was held Oct. 7-10 at Meridian, with a large atendance. Among the speakers were J. H. Mohorter, Grant K. Lewis, G. W. Muckley and J. C. Ogden, for several years a missionary in Thibet.

The church at Maryville, Mo., is making progress, having had accessions at the Sunday services for the past eight weeks. The congregations sent their pastor, Claude J. Miller to Louisville, paying all his expenses. Mr. Miller recently held a two weeks' meeting at Burlington Junction, Mo., with fifty accessions.

At the annual meeting of Central Church, Rockford, Ill., the pastor, W. B. Clemmer, was given a unanimous invitation to remain. Resolutions were also passed expressing appreciation of Mr. Clemmer's work in bringing about the erection of their building, and for the work of C. G. Kindred of Chicago, who recently conducted a meeting there.

M. M. Davis, pastor of Ross Avenue Church, Dallas, Tex., preached an anniversary sermon on Oct. 6, commemorating his twenty-two years of work in the Dallas ministry. Mr. Davis was for eighteen years pastor of Central Church, during which time six new organizations were formed from this congregation.

At a recent meeting in the interests of the foreign work at Central Church, Uniontown, Pa., the foreign field was represented by Dr. Royal J. Dye, D. O. Cunningham, Bruce L. Kershner, A. L. Shelton and A. E. Cary. H. Maxwell Hall, pastor of this church, at a recent Sunday evening service, gave an interesting historical sketch of the Disciples of Christ.

An enthusiastic rally was held on a recent Sunday at First Church, San Bernadino, Cal., where A. F. Roadhouse ministers. The principal address was made by M. D. Clubb, of Los Angeles, secretary of the Southern California district, and short talks were also given by W. B. Craig of Redlands and S. T. Martin of Rialto. The sum of $5,100 was raised at this service to apply on the church debt and for other expenses.

Dr. Peter Ainslie's book, "God and Me," has been translated into Hindu and published by the Christian Mission Press in India. Some missionaries in South America are making a Spanish translation of it. The book has a vital message.

More than a score of his former parishioners came from Taylorville to Peoria, Ill., on a recent Sunday to pay a complimentary visit to M. L. Pontius, pastor Central Church of Peoria. They were entertained in the homes of the church members.

The fourth annual "Old Folks Service" at Central Church, Dallas, Tex., was held on Sunday, October 6. Automobiles were sent all over the city to bring old people to the church. This is a beautiful service and is very popular as conducted by J. O. Shelburne, the pastor.

The church at Greensburg, Ind., observed its eightieth anniversary with a week of special services September 29 to October 6. Among the speakers for special evening addresses were Cloyd Goodnight, Shelbyville; C. E. Hill, Valparaiso; Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, Indianapolis; E. W. Thornton, Cincinnati; Pres. R. H. Crossfield, Lexington, Ky., and the pastor, A Homer Jordan.

F. M. Rogers of Long Beach, Calif., visited Phillips Christian University of Enid, Okla., recently and is on a tour of inspection of a number of Disciple schools in quest of usable information in the founding of the California College soon to be established in some southern California city. A quarter million dollar fund will be raised before the institution is begun.

W. S. Lockhart of Central Church, Houston, Tex., began a series of sermons on Oct. 13, on "The Modern Significance of the Ten Commandments." In this series Mr. Lockhart will discuss the Ten Commandments as they apply to modern life, pointing out how the principles contained therein apply to modern conditions. The subjects will be as follows:

Oct. 13—"Other Gods." (First Commandment.)

Oct. 20—"Graven Images," or "Art Development Among the Hebrews." (Second Commandment.)

Oct. 27—"Profanity"—Our National Blight. (Third commandment.)

Nov. 3—"The Social Significance of the Sabbath." (Fourth commandment.)

Nov. 10 — "Honoring Parenthood," or "Modern Home Life." (Fifth commandment.

Nov. 17—"Murder," or "Sanitation and Working Conditions." (Sixth commandments.)

Nov. 24——"The Traffic in Human Flesh." (Seventh commandment.)

Dec. 1—"Theft," or "Modern Graft." (Eighth commandment.)

Dec. 8—"Membership in the Ananias Club." (Ninth commandment.)

Dec. 15—"Covetousness," or "America's Reign of Money." (Tenth commandment.)

Illinois Secretary's Letter.

Galesburg has called H. A. Denton of Troy, N. Y., who will begin his work there Nov. 24.

Latham has called Ira Engle of Carrollton and he is now on the field.

J. L. Fisher has accepted a call to the Paxton pulpit and has already begun his work.

The folks at Keithsburg served meals at their county fair and cleared $600, and sent their faithful minister, L. F. DePoister, to the Louisville convention all expenses paid. That is the way to do things.

A. L. Huff of Centralia reports 13 additions since the convention.

G. W. Ford will remain another year with the West Salem church where they are building a $12,000 house. Mr. Ford can hold a meeting of two between now and Christmas. Call him.

There are a few good young preachers in Eureka who are available for half or full time service. Our churches ought to feel a keen sense of obligation to give these young men a chance. They will make good.

H. M. Garn of Canton, Mo., has taken the work at Denver full time.

Another Canton boy, Floyd Taylor, gives half time to Wythe, near Sutter, in Hancock county.

Williamsville has called F. M. Myrick of California and he began Oct. 6.

Orville Hawkins of Cartter has accepted the work at Dallas City and will be on the field soon.

L. S. Harrington of Wapella has accepted the call of the Cowden church to begin at once.

The McFarland evangelical company are in a very promising meeting at Freeport with a number of additions. E. T. Cornelius is the minister and he is full of hope and enthusiasm for that work.

C. W. Freeman of St. Elmo held a fine meeting for the Antioch church in Wabash county with 28 additions.

Frank H. Vernor of Georgetown is assisting F. M. Morgan in a meeting at Ashland, beginning Oct. 16.

It is with unusual regret that we announce that we are to lose W. W. Sniff of Paris from the state. He has accepted a call to the large church at Newcastle, Pa. It is a great field and he will serve in it with great credit and we rejoice with him in his advancement, but we are sorry to give him up from our own state. He is an honored member of our state board.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

There are two missionary days in November and please keep them distinct in your minds. The first Sunday in November has been our "Illinois Day" for many years, when we ask all our churches to make their annual offering for state missions. The third Sunday in November has been adopted in recent years as Bible-school day for American missions. They are so close together that the preparatory work laps over and it is apt to be confusing. Keep it clear.

J. A. Barnett of the Third Church, Danville, will hold a meeting in November for the Second church where L. N. Early is the minister.

Preachers who enrolled in the regular way when they came into the state will not be asked to enrol again every year. One enrollment holds good as long as he is in the state and his record is good.

Did you order supplies for Illinois Day Nov. 3? All the supplies are free and sent prepaid.

W. T. Hecker of Mount Morris writes us that he has resigned to take work further south where the winters are less rigorous.

The new Year Book is about ready to be mailed.

Chicago Disciples Assembly

The quarterly assembly of Chicago Disciples of Christ wil be held under the auspices of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society at the First Methodist Church, Washington and Clark, October 27, 1912, 3 p. m.

The following program will be given: Prelude; hymn, "There's a Wideness in God's Mercy;" scripture, Rev. V. T. Wood, West Pullman Church; solo, Mr. Lon T. Payne, Hyde Park Church; prayer, Rev. E. L. Payne, Hyde Park Church; address, "Report of the National Convention," Rev. Austin Hunter, Jackson Boulevard Church.

Some City Problems.

American Missions

The Home Mission Board will report the best record of gifts from churches, Bible-schools and individuals of any year in its history. There was a gain of 492 churches to the list of givers. The total receipts of money this year are $178,884.26, a gain over last year of $58,120.20. To this increase should be added the total subscriptions taken in special work for foreigners in Minneapolis, Cleveland and New York, amounting to $66,210, thus making a grand total of gains in the year, $124,330.20. The urgent appeal for increased funds to meet the crisis of the society has awakened a hearty response. The conditions which made that appeal imperative still prevail. The returns, while more abundant, are limited to states, which send their money through the American treasury, to be expended within their own teritory. These receipts, while enlarged, are restricted and do not relieve the society of the burden from a deficit caused by over-appropriations.

A most worthy memorial has been made by Mr. and Mrs. John G. Vissering, of Dana, Ill., who have made a gift of $500 in memory of their beloved son, John Burton, who died on the eve of his high school graduation, June 3, 1910. He was a noble young Christian, ready to give the purity and strength of his life for the Master's service. Thus through the gift of his parents he will preach the gospel in the home land through the voice of B. L. Wray, their living link. Such parental devotion, such patriotic love and such loyalty to our Lord should inspire others to do likewise.

The two new churches organized this year in Wisconsin, at Janesville, an important city, and Soldiers' Grove, a thriving little town, are prospering. Frank L. Van Voorhis is in a good meeting in the cuntry near Gillett, Wis., and the indications are that a strong congregation wil be organized in a settled community. A church is badly needed, and the people have a mind to co-operate for religious development.

Carpenter, Wyo., is a small but promising field for the planting of a church of Christ. A few faithful brethren have been pleading for a year for somebody to come there and preach to them. The A. C. M. S. has recommended a half-dozen ministers within that time, but none were able to give time and service needed. Is there a young man who will volunteer for that field? Write Alex Holt, Carpenter, Wyo.

Pray for our home land. There is a great need for guidance of the spirit of God for the re-study of the Word, that the followers of Christ shal understand the trend of our missionary life and the day of visitation. Pray without ceasing!

ger delights those of us who sang "Hear my prayer" to its simple strain at our mother's knee. Many another good tune went with them, the only crime of which seemed to be that it was singable, and that we poor commoners enjoyed it.

Still, in my capacity as advocate of the ordinary person, I must utter a plain protest against the pedantry of our present hymnal; and be it understood that despite these criticisms, that hymnal has no sincere or more grateful admirer than I.

Pure Pedantry.

But the passion for getting back to the original of a hymn, no matter how inferior that original might be, was, I venture to suggest, pedantry pure and simple. In the first place, it resulted in substituting in many places "I" for "we." Now, whenever possible, worship should not be personal, but representative. It should help us to lose ourselves in our association in the life of faith and service. It is surely only a pedantic devotion to the original of a poem that prevents its finding a place in our hymn-book in the form most suitable for congregational use.

Neither have I the slightest sympathy with the theory of verbal inspiration which precludes some slight alteration in the language which may make all the difference between a hymn that can be sung and a religious poem that cannot. The compilers of our present book took their courage in both hands when "the troops of Midian" ceased to prowl around us, and, instead, the powers of evil encompassed us; and they were right.

Dislikes Morbid Sentiment.

We may take it that the average man dislikes morbid and doubtful sentiments in hymns, and does not feel refreshed or admonished by them. I sincerely hope it may be possible to make the perspective of the new book truer. A book in which "love to man" is represented by three hymns and "the burial of the dead" by ten fails in Christian proportion. I imagine the early Christians used their hymns and spiritual songs to inspire them to conquer the Roman Empire and its corruptions by the spirit of justice and love. What we miss most of all in our hymn-book is songs of freedom, progress and human service. In this respect, Congregationalism should lead Christendom rather than follow any pattern, ancient or modern. Here our hymn-book should be most of all distinctive. It should speak for us. It should discipline our souls in the love of truth and liberty and justice.

Christian Unity by Christian Culture

WE solve problems on the plane of authority by reason of what we BELIEVE. We solve those on the plane of reason by virtue of what we KNOW. We solve some on the plane of culture by reason of WHAT WE ARE. I shall dismiss all except our greatest problem—that of Christian union. We have been working at the problem of union for a long time, and we have something to show for this work. We have tried it on the plane of authority, and there is a place for the authority of Christ in the settlement of this question. We have tried logic and argument, and there is a place for reason in the outcome. But I have an idea that when the Christian union problem is solved, it will be solved in the realm of feeling. I think so because I believe that Christian union, when it comes, will be a union of PEOPLE. To what extent there will be doctrinal agreement, is uncertain; but there must be personal agreement. There must be sympathy and fellowship. Christians were not made for Christian union, but Christian union for Christians. The people are the chief thing. Therefore it is well to note that on the plane of Christian culture we have the most effective means of drawing God's people together. We have been trying for a century to get people to like our plea. We ought to begin now trying to get people to like us.—

Reverses of the Turkish Army

Fortunes of war are not falling in a way to please the Turks in Macedonia. In fact, Turkish armies have been driven back on every point of vantage. It may be Turkey's "Bull Run," but she has made a bad beginning for a successful conquest of her warring neighbors and dependents. She is now facing four enemies at once, Greece, Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro, all of which are sending formidable armies to invade Turkish territory. Turkey concluded her unsuccessful Italian war with expressions of great relief and joy because she would now engage in a war in which her powerful armies would be of service. She hoped and expected to crush the weaker allies with a flourish and one powerful blow, and thus give the new government a strong hold upon the hearts of its people. This it has signally failed to do. From the first the armies of the allies have driven their Turkish oppressors back and are now following them into their own territory. Every succeeding day brings reports of new Turkish losses or defeats. Most important of the engagements so far is the surrender of the Turkish fort at Kirk-Kilisseh with 50,000 men. Two generals were among the captives. Considerable supplies, arms and ammunition fell into the hands of the Bulgarians at the same time. Another body of 8,000 Turks attacked a body of Bulgarians near Adrianople but were repulsed and fled in disorder, leaving all supplies. On the Turkish frontier near Montenegro, the Turks are surrounded in Scutari and the town is besieged and on Monday the telegraphic dispatches announced its fall. The Servians likewise have been successful. There the forces have annihilated the Turkish batteries, according to the latest dispatches, and have occupied Novipazar, Pristina, Kumanova, Kratovo, and Kotschana. Probably Turkey has not fully gotten down to business, and will be more successful later, but she will need immense increase in fighting strength before she can hope to win this war. She has far greater resources than the allies, because she can borrow from foreign bankers, while the allies have been practically boycotted. Most of the nations of Europe have declared their neutrality, but to date the United States has taken no action. It is our policy to be conservative and to avoid extremes.

The Call of the Christ

The Chicago Daily News says: "Christ calls men to himself, and through vision, love and possession one grows on to likeness. Jesus is the living expression of God's life in terms of humanity, and he is the supreme manifestation of the normal humanity. His life is the one character most easy to reproduce. Christ's call is to intellect, heart and will, to rouse the best manhood of this age, and for it all the world, says the author, is waiting. This is an illuminating, hope bringing, strengthening work."

The Baptist Commonwealth says: "Only a few men could have written this masterly exposition of the character of Jesus. It is a work of striking power and reality—a vital, living, convincing portrayal. Scholarly, yet simple, philosophical yet understandable, original in phraseology yet lucid, a positive yet persuasive presentation of the claims of Christ. It will strengthen the faith of those in doubt, cheer the sorrowing, give courage to the fearful, bring hope to the despairing—in a word, impart to every reader a satisfactory and realistic vision of the Master."

The Watchman says: "People who have listened to Prof. Willett as a public speaker have been impressed by the clearness, simplicity and logic with which he expresses his ideas. The same characteristics appear in the volume under notice. It is a scholarly, philosophical and understandable presentation of a great theme."

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

When the Old and the New Met

NOT SIMPLY TWO MEN BUT TWO dispensations met when Mr. Ames from the convention platform made his renunciation in behalf of the Hyde Park Church, for the sake of peace, and Mr. Briney pledged himself anew to the support of the work of the Foreign Missionary Society.

The conservative and the liberal groups among the Disciples were there seen at their best, not in the discussion of doctrines concerning which men have never agreed, and probably never will agree, but in the practice of that charity which is possessed only by those who have the gifts and graces of the Spirit. Deeper than doctrine is life, as surely as untroubled seas lie far beyond the winds that turn the surface into fury.

One of these men stood as the representative of the passing order; the other for the new order, so new, in fact, that the good men who still love the old find themselves perplexed as they try to answer the importunate demands which the new makes upon them. But that the new era has arrived is no longer the subject of debate. Were that not true the masterful address of President Chilton could not have been delivered.

There was a time in the ministry of Mr. Briney in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky, when he was in his prime, that it was whispered by cautious lips into the confidential ears of self-appointed guardians of the faith that "Brother Briney is a dangerous man, a very dangerous man." We can easily enough see the shrugging of shoulders and the tilting of eyebrows which always follow the announcement of such revelations. There is no doubt that Mr. Briney often met, as a result, the smile of aristocratic derision and the cold recoil of suspicion.

But out of that era the Disciples are passing and Mr. Briney, one time under suspicion, has come to be the guardian of things established against the alleged promoters of innovation. No one will say that he has not done his duty.

In the years intervening between the era when the citadel of our faith was in the Blue Grass region, and not farther north, the Disciples have been lessening their emphasis on certain phases of doctrine and placing more emphasis on others. They still believe the essence of the older doctrines, but new occasions teach new duties, and a new order brings with it new ideas. The time came for re-statement. We are ever seeking new expressions for our plea; a postal card contribution to that end is in progress today. So, in spite of ourselves, we are moving.

These facts are cited to prove what no intelligent man will deny, viz., that all thinking men at some period of their lives are heretical, due to changes which are interpreted differently by different natures. The late Professor McGarvey was a heretic in the eyes of the Nashville brethren. Metaphorically he has been many times stretched on the rack. All who differ from us are heretics. But heresy and orthodoxy are merely relative words, and fortunately the sting is being extracted from the former.

At the convention men called each other heretics, and burst into laughter. There was no indignant protest, no resentment. A few years ago argument would have followed the charge, and we are to be congratulated because that word which has kindled so many martyr fires, and produced no end of dissensions among all denominations is fast passing into the vocabulary of the joker.

The word in the mouths of all intelligent peoples today is 'truth,' and not heresy, for truth, as Charles Kingsley said, is God's orthodoxy. All Romanists regard Protestants as heretics; and the Mohammedan world calls the Christian world infidel. The men who have learned to smile under such provocation are entitled to a high place in the noble army of martyrs.

And as it is interesting to note that the heretic of thirty years ago has passed to the ranks of the orthodox, the heretic of today—Mr. Ames, for instance—may in the next thirty years stand where Mr. Briney stood at the Louisville convention. Who knows?

These two men who are entitled to our admiration, though in their thinking they are so diverse, teach us all that doctrinal differences need not prevent the exercise of the Christian graces. It was a great act of renunciation that Mr. Ames performed; it was fine in its simplicity, lacking everything that had even a suggestion of the melodramatic. When Mr. Briney pledged himself anew to the work of the Foreign Society, his spirit was as thoroughly Christian and fraternal; and in such renunciation and devotion we may find that agreement of soul that exists among the goodly campany of the faithful the world over. The distance between Hyde Park and Pewee Valley would not be so great if we practiced brotherhood more.

One wonders just now how many of those who have been impatient with Mr. Ames would have done what he did—but let that pass. Had these two men discussed their differences on the platform they would have been discussing yet; they laid aside those differences for the sake of peace and efficiency in the cause which they both love.

We can now say with new meaning, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!"

The Farmer and the High Cost of Living

There are usually two sides to every story. In our efforts to locate the cause of the high cost of living, we seem to have overlooked one of the principal factors which have brought about this condition. To lay the blame at the door of the trusts, or of the middleman, was the easiest way of settling the question offhand and putting it out of the way. But repeated investigations of great corporations to determine whether monopolies exist and whether abuse of the monopolistic power is responsible for the rise in values have failed to sustain this contention. A writer in the Financial Chronicle puts an entirely new front on the story by placing the blame squarely with the farmer himself. Tremendous progress in methods and betterment of equipment are found in every line of industry except farming. The farmer stands just about where he stood ten years ago. The writer of the article referred to states that no more land is now under cultivation in the United States than then, nor are the methods of farming generally improved, or the size of the crops increased. He quotes from the crop reports for the years 1899 and 1909. The yield for the latter year was smaller than for the former, yet the smaller crop sold for $4,934,490,000, while the larger yield, ten years earlier, brought the farmer only $2,962,358,000. That means the farmer received in 1909, $1,972,132,000 more for the smaller of the two crops than for the larger. This is an increase of 66.6 per cent. This increase has to be paid by the people. While the supply of products has not increased, the population of the country has increased 21 per cent, thus increasing the demand for them. The Financial Chronicle sums up the situation as follows: "Only 2,552,189,630 bushels of corn were raised in 1909, against 2,666,324,370 bushels in 1899, but the value of the lessened product of 1909 was $1,438,553,919, against $828,192,388, an increase of 73.7 per cent. The wheat crop was 3.8 per cent greater in 1909 than in 1899, at 683,379,000 bushels, against 658,534,252 bushels, but the increase in value was 77.8 per cent; so that the 1909 crop had a value of $657,656,801, against only $369,945,320 in 1899. The oats crop during the ten years increased from 943,389,375 bushels to 1,007,142,980 bushels, or 6.8 per cent, but the value of the crop jumped 91 per cent; hence, it realized to the farmer $414,697,422, against only $217,098,584 in 1899. What would be thought of the 'trust,' or industrial combination, which had failed to provide for an addition of 16,000,000 in population and had rested content with the old output, when an enlarged product was so clearly demanded? What would be said of our rail carriers had they failed to provide additional cars and other facilities to take care of the added requirements following an expansion in population of 21 per cent?" We wonder what farmers will say to this?

"The Police Disease"

Wendell Phillips had the insight of a prophet when he said on one occasion that the time would come when the American cities would strain our free institutions as slavery had never done. Has the time come when this prophecy is about to be fulfilled? Those who are cognizant of conditions in Chicago, to say nothing of many other cities, might well wonder if that time had not already arrived. It is certain that this is the opinion across the water, judging by the comments of the European press upon the notorious Rosenthal case, the trial of which is now in progress in the New York courts. The shame of the American metropolis has been heralded far and wide, not only throughout Europe, but all over the Orient. In a recent number of the Outlook a well-informed writer graphically depicts the succeeding steps of the tragedy referred to under the striking title of "Our Police Disease." The Rosenthal-Becker case is, then, to be regarded not as an isolated instance, brought about by an unusual combination of circumstances, but a trouble which has become chronic, as previous investigations have revealed, though they have utterly failed to effect a cure. There can be but little doubt that more than one American city is afflicted with this same disease. What are its causes and why does it spread? The most obvious answer is that corrupt men are often in high places upon the police forces of our American cities, but that is more or less true of other occupations, and will continue to be true so long as human nature is what it is. The real answer is to be found in the reply to another question. How is it possible for unscrupulous men to have formed a "system," so thoroughly entrenched as to defy every effort hitherto made to remove it? Such a condition of affairs in an English city is almost unthinkable. One of the causes lies in the relation of the city to the state, which often treats the former as a minor ward, determining what rules and regulations shall govern its conduct, but placing upon the city the responsibility of enforcing the laws in the making of which it has had no voice. Another reason lies in the assumption: "Once a policeman, always a policeman." The subordinates on the police force have an almost uninterrupted tenure of office. Chiefs and commissioners are here today and gone tomorrow. They can have no real authority. It is no wonder that greed and lust can form alliances with the underworld which are most difficult to disturb. Our municipal life is going through one of the severest tests it has ever experienced. We need something that goes deeper than the sporadic agitation so characteristic of American reform. The "police disease" is no ephemeral child's disorder; nor is it a functional disturbance; it is organic. It cannot be cured simply by the use of the knife in the removal of these human cancers that have been eating out the heart of our police systems, although the fact that Lieutenant Becker has been pronounced guilty of murder in the first degree by a jury of his peers will have a wholesome effect upon the thugs in both the police-world and the underworld. To point out the remedy will tax the resources of our ablest moral and social diagnosticians; to apply it —which is a far more important thing to do—will call for a higher level of public opinion, which is not only keenly sensitive to social wrongs but inured to withstand moral fatigue.

A Woman in the Office

A clean-minded young college man was given charge of the work of purchasing small supplies for a concern in the Middle West. All day long there passed through his office a stream of salesmen, representing every sort and type of the men who sell goods. Most of them were fellows of intelligence, dignity and clean conversation. But a certain portion had false conceptions of selling methods, and resorted to familiarity and vulgar stories. The tone of the office seemed to be getting lower and lower when the young man had been there several weeks. The vulgar and profane element among his visitors was not only distasteful to him, but stayed longer than was necessary for the transaction of business, and took up his time.

Matters were apparently getting beyond his control altogether when he followed a hint dropped by an older man, and had his stenographer's desk moved into the same room with his own. Immediately the whole situation changed. Visitors had to talk within earshot of a young woman. Profanity and vulgarity ceased automatically. The tone of the place was raised to a decent level. Discussion was held so strictly to business details that the time given to salesmen every day was cut squarely in half.

This incident illustrates one valuable service rendered by women in our business life today.

A generation ago, women were not commonly found in American offices. It was the typewriter that first gave them an opportunity to go beyond the feminine occupations of teaching, domestic service and factory operations. Once taken into office work, their knack at faithfully handling details of correspondence led to wider opportunities. The typewriter was followed by other office machinery. Systems of filing and record-keeping were extended. Advertising brought with it an amount of mailing and correspondence previously unknown, and the formation of great corporations, with their inter-correspondence between officials and departments, created thousands of fresh places for women. All these new activities have steadily drawn more and more girls and women into business until today the business woman is a permanent figure in our commercial and unmistakable.

Christian Union and the Social Spirit

Christian Union has been hindered more by cold and unbrotherly hearts than by intellectual divergence.

Christian Union is to find its way into the churches through the social spirit. Men who dream of universal brotherhood cannot abide strife and competition. The social service man who knows his message is never a sectarian. He who would build again the denominational fences usually has but little interest in child labor or in establishing proper hours for workingmen. The man who works to secure the abolishment of the tenements and who seeks for proper conditions for growing healthy children cannot combine this interest with sectarian zeal.

The Sunday-school and the Religious Conquest of America

It is the religious conquest of America that we are to consider. he ecclesiastical conquest is something different. Ambitious churchıen see America as an opportunity for the extension of their parcular form of ecclesiasticism and for the promotion of their perɔnal dignity. The success of any one group of churchmen in imɔsing their organization upon the country might impoverish the eligious life of the people. The machinery of religion must not e substituted for religion.

The Sunday-school is democratic. It offers to every one an opporunity to make a contribution to the common stock of knowledge. he learned and the unlearned may sit together and discuss the ieaning of life. Rich and poor, young and old, men and women ieet to study the most important questions that command the atention of human beings. In a Sunday-school that is worthy of the ame, frank expression of convictions is sought. Every one is aught to respect his own experience and that of others.

A teacher of philosophy has said that the study of ethics is more ifficult than that of mathematics. I wonder how this statement trikes the majority of us? We see people every day. Their actions re familiar. If we know anything, we know how to weigh the eeds of men. Thus we reason, or seem to reason. The study of onduct seems easy because we are not studying it at all. We misake haphazard observations and random remarks for study and erious discussion. It is our fault if the Bible class is uninterestng. The subjects are great and important and become interesting o those who study them.

The study of the Bible ought to be more difficult than it is for nany of us. I do not mean that the Bible should be made or be ısed as a book of puzzles. I mean that we often think familiarity vith the words of the Bible is the same thing as knowledge of ts teachings. We can repeat the Lord's prayer; do we know what t means? Perhaps we can recite the words of the Sermon on the Mount: do we understand them and do we recite their moral and religious precepts in our conduct? The scriptural preacher or teacher is one who has spiritual ideas in his head and in his heart; he may or may not be able to quote copiously and accurately from the Bible.

We can begin at once the work of adding to the power of the Sunday-school as a factor in the religious conquest of America. The class that I attend and the class that you attend will be more interesting and therefore more useful if you and I give serious and prolonged attention to the subjects that are offered for our consideration in the Sunday-school. If these subjects are not the right ones, we can get others. If one class increases in efficiency, others will receive benefit. The school grows when it commands the enthusiastic loyalty of its members. One good school stimulates other schools through the good report of it that goes abroad and through the members it sends to other communities.

Early specialization of instincts is a favorite topic of writers on education. The child is born with tendencies to love, to hate, to fear, to fight, to collect, to imitate; whether it will love, hate, fear, fight, collect and imitate as it ought depends in a large measure upon its surroundings. Herein are the possibilities of the home and the school. We influence the growth of children indirectly through surroundings. We cannot touch a life directly. What we do and say and what we place before the child will stimulate its activity. By the time the child is old enough to know the power of habit, its habits will have been formed and with them its moral and religious sentiments. If adults are converted, let us not give all the glory to the preacher or the personal worker; let us remember the teacher of children whose work made it possible for the gospel to make an appeal to the man and the woman.

Children's Day for Home Missions will soon be here. This study is preparatory to that day. How shall we make it a day for the training of childen as well as a day for gathering money? This question must be answered by the superintendents and teachers of the Sunday-schools. What the older persons in the school and in the church say about Home Missions will have much influence. If the minister is citicised for urging the school to give money, or if the day is regarded as an interference with the regular work of the school, children will not be deeply impressed with the plea for the neglected children of America. Our unkind criticism of the minister and others who believe in preaching the gospel in America may have tremendous consequences for some child. [Midweek Service, Nov. 13. Around the Bay

(Editorial Correspondence.)

It was one of the serious disappointments of the trip to the Pacific Coast that we had to cut short our stay by several days, and entirely omit a visit to Los Angeles and Pasadena which we had promised ourselves and our friends there. But the three days left us in and near San Francisco were full of interest, and gave a meager opportunity to see some of the churches of the district, and to inquire about others.

The chief enterprise of our northern California work at the present time is the share we have acquired in the Pacific Theological Seminary. When the activities of the Berkeley Bible Seminary were suspended some months ago, and its faculty dismissed, it seemed good to several Disciples of the Bay district, who did not wish to see our educational work discontinued, to take advantage of the opportunity offered by the Pacific institution.

This admirable foundation, formerly a Congregational divinity school, had recently been placed upon an entirely undenominational basis. Its close relations with the University of California, the leading educational plant on the Pacific slope, and its union character, made it the object of keen interest to those Disciples who believed in an adequately prepared ministry and took seriously the plea of the Disciples in behalf of Christian unity

President Nash is a man of profoundly earnest convictions regarding the Christian faith, admirable scholarship, genial and courteous nature, and abiding confidence in the practicable character of the program of an undenominational yet thoroughly Christian institution of education, in which the different evangelical churches may unite without prejudice to any essential element of the faith. For this very reason he welcomes the Disciples as a people committed by their history and plea to the very work in which the seminary is concerned.

Accordingly when an opportunity offered to place a Disciple in the teaching force of the Pacific Theological Seminary, the men above mentioned took advantage of the opening, formed an organization sufficient for the purpose, and chose Prof. Harvey H. Guy as the one to contribute to the seminary the instructional service to which the Disciples were invited. No one who is in any manner acquainted with Professor Guy can doubt his fitness for the position.

To his natural abilities and careful academic and university preparation there had been added the discipline of years of experience in instructional work in Japan, where he was counted among the very strongest of the missionary force. When compelled to return by family considerations, he was appropriately chosen dean of the Berkeley Bible Seminary. From that position he naturally passed, as the most timely choice, to the incumbency of the new chair of Church History in the Pacific institution, thus representing the interest of the Disciples in that admirable plant and its union work.

To the support of this chair the churches of northern California are now setting themselves. Forgetting as far as possible the differences of opinion which former educational efforts have caused, recognizing in the efforts made elsewhere on the coast the right and the value of similar attempt at adequate educational equipment, and anxious not only to take advantage of the most auspicious opening presented at their very doors, an opening comparable to which no foundation of the Disciples working alone could be realized within the generation; and most of all, desirous of proving the reality and seriousness of their devotion to the ideal of Christian unity, these brethren are proceeding in a quiet and constructive way to realize their hopes and those of our people in general.

It was impossible to fill the program of addresses which had been planned ahead. The Sunday and Monday meetings we missed altogether, though others took the place without loss of value to the cause. But Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings were spent with the First Churches of San Francisco, Fresno and Berkeley, and they were most interesting and delightful meetings, not without significance, it may be hoped, to the educational and union work of the churches.

The University of California has a student body rapidly approaching the leading place numerically among American universities. In this body of students there are at least seventy-five Disciples, forty or more of them young men. It is not too much to believe that at least ten or fifteen of these might be induced to give themselves to the ministry, provided they were rightly encouraged, and had the opportunity to fit themselves for such a work at an institution near their homes. Such an institution is now provided, not only to the community in general, but to the Disciples themselves, on terms which they could not duplicate in a generation of the most sustained effort and the most generous giving.

It is for these reasons that the call of the trustees of the newly founded chair in Pacific Theological Seminary is timely and inspiring. It is already being heard. Funds have been provided for the current year, and before its close these will be increased to the point which will assure the permanency of the work. This is the enterprise of all the Disciples who live in the northern portion of the state and believe that the brotherhood has a duty to ministerial education and Christian unity. On other points there may be differences of opinion among the different congregations, as there are always varieties of emphasis and usage. Such differences are the right of the individual churches, and they will emerge wherever men think and labor with free minds and hands.

But above all such varieties of opinion and activity there remain the fundamental unities of faith and service, and in such faith and service the churches of northern California may well unite to make permanent and effective the work of education and Christian unity so admirably begun for them and by them at Pacific Theological Seminary. Coming Together

We cannot help feeling that the correspondence recently passing between Rev. W. F. Richardson and The Christian Century is a positive contribution to clear thinking on the question of baptism, and as we read the following additional inquiries we are convinced that he and we are approaching an understanding and a common view. That Mr. Richardson should adopt thus consistently the interrogative form for his comunications is an act of courtesy the delicacy of which we fully appreciate. Were it not for the manifestly painstaking and sincere fashion in which his inquiries are framed, together with their pertinency, The Christian Century would hesitate to take so disproportionate a share of the space allotted to the correspondence. But we know that our good friend truly wishes us to deal directly with his points and at whatever length may be profitable. For the sake of clearness we have paragraphed and numbered Mr. Richardson's questions and our replies will bear corresponding numbers. His note is as follows:

Dear Brother Morrison: Suffer me a few words further, in reply to your editorial of Oct. 3, "Response to Two Inquiries." In that part of the editorial devoted to my questions, you use the following language:

"When the minister administers baptism he inducts or initiates the properly qualified candidate into the Church of Christ, he confers upon him the status of a Christian. . . . But this social act of inducting the candidate into the Church of Christ can be performed, like every other similar social act, only by the use of some physical objective sign or form. This objective sign might historically have been any one of many physical acts. In the modern church many ministers sprinkle water on the candidate's head. In the early church the ministers immersed the candidate in water. For the reasons given . . . above, we believe that it is desirable for baptism to be solemnized by immersion only."

1. Now, Brother Morrison, is it not true that, even if the objective sign used in baptism might have been any one of many, the fact is that it was not any one of many, but one alone, and that one so full of meaning and beauty as to make its abandonment by a portion of the church to be deeply deplored, and its reinstatement, according to your belief, so important to the accomplishment of Christian unity?

2. And, further, if such practice of immersion in the administration of Christian baptism is so desirable, from every standpoint, what is there to be gained by our recognition of the practice of sprinkling, as being a rightful substitute for that in whose fitness and historical form we are so thoroughly agreed?

3. It will not do to say that you do not propose to recognize sprinkling as a substitute for immersion, for that is exactly what is meant by your proposed reception into our churches of those who have been sprinkled, instead of immersed. No matter what such sprinkling or immersion may mean to you, the former stands in the place of the latter, whatever that place is.

4. Is it not better, while gladly recognizing the Christian character and life of our brethren of other communions, and uniting with them in every practicable form of Christian activity, for us (a) to continue to bear witness to the primitive and unquestioned New Testament practice, and (b) admit into our congregation those only who have received Christian baptism according to the apostolic pattern? Fraternally yours,

First Church, Kansas City. W. F. Richardson.

1. Yes indeed. The Christian Century believes that the historic fact that immersion was the outward sign by which in the early church the baptismal or initiatory act was consummated is itself a presumptive argument for our use of the same outward sign. We deplore its abandonment by a portion of the church and we labor earnestly for its reinstatement.

2. Nothing at all is to be gained by recognizing sprinkling as a "rightful substitute" for immersion. In our view it is not a "rightful" substitute. It is a substitute that has sacrificed a certain historicity and a certain symbolism in the baptismal act, and it has been an occasion of disunity in the Church of Christ.

3. We do not at all dispute that sprinkling is a substitute for immersion, though not a "rightful" substitute. To admit that a baptism administered by sprinkling is nevertheless a valid baptism is not for a moment to admit that the sprinkling is unobjectionable. It is objectionable. But its objectionableness is not so serious as to invalidate the baptism, the initiation into the Church of Christ. The New Testament does not make either sprinkling or immersion mandatory; it makes baptism, i. e., the acceptance of Church membership, mandatory. The sanctions for immersion as the preferable form for administering baptism, are to be found outside of New Testament mandate.

But Mr. Richardson is entirely wrong when he says that "the proposed reception into our churches of those who have been sprinkled" means the recognition of sprinkling as in some sense a rightful "substitute" for immersion. The question of receiving such persons into our churches has nothing at all to do with our views of sprinkling and immersion—unless we hold the view that none save the immersed are members of the Church of Christ. But Disciples do not so hold. Mr. Richardson does not so hold. He and The Christian Century and the Disciples generally, hold that Presbyterians and Congregationalists are members of the Church of Christ, and this is the one and only thing we "recognize" or acknowledge concerning them when we receive them into our fellowship. To acknowledge that they are members of the Church of Christ, and to treat them as such, does not carry with it an acknowledgement of the complete satisfactoriness of the way by which they were initiated into the Church, i. e., baptized. We receive Dunkard Christians into our fellowship, but we do not acknowledge that their form of initiation, viz., trine immersion, is unobjectionable. No more would we "recognize" the sprinkling of our Presbyterian brethren should we extend them the fellowship of our churches.

The sole question on which our duty with respect to the unimmersed turns is this: Are they in? Not: How did they get in? Nor: What do they believe, now that they are in? But simply: Are they inside the body of Christ? If Presbyterians and Methodists are in the body of Christ (which is his Church) there is nothing left for other members of that body to do but to fellowship them. To do otherwise is to create or to maintain schism in the body.

4. (a) Yes, we think it is better to continue to bear witness to the primitive and unquestioned New Testament practice of immersion, just as our churches have done for a hundred years. But,

(b) We consider it a duty to which we are bound by the elemental principles of our plea, and by the inescapable command of our Lord to receive into the complete fellowship our our congregations every soul whom he has received into his Church. And we declare it to be the essential business of the Disciples of Christ to proclaim this duty plainly, positively and without ceasing, and to practice it ourselves in the joy of a Christ-imposed privilege.

Mr. McLellan's Convention Sermon

Besides affording edification and a high degree of delight to the thousands that heard them, the two extraordinary addresses delivered by Rev. Hugh McLellan and Rev. C. M. Chilton at the Louisville convention afford also some interesting suggestions for comparison and contrast.

Liberal excerpts from both addresses were published last week in The Christian Century. Each speech was a model of homiletic art. Each was notable for its fine, precise and eloquent phrasing. Each was vibrant with true religious passion. Each dealt in an original fashion with the living problems with which the Disciples of Christ are at this hour confronted. At this time we will pause to consider the convention sermon, and next week we will have somewhat to say of Dr. Chilton's presidential address.

Mr. McLellan's sermon was a balanced, symmetrical and safe presentation of the problems. It moved forward, but could hardly be called progressive on account of the presence of an equal backward movement. It contained some very conservative statements yet was saved from reactionism by the presence of a marked liberal element.

Having divided the problems into three static classes,—those which are to be settled on the plane of authority, those which are to be settled on the plane of wisdom and those which are to be settled on the plane of culture,—there was little danger that any statement made in dealing with the problems on one plane would go so far, either forward or backward, as to be out of reach of a qualifying statement made concerning the problems on another plane.

But if Mr. McLellan's sermon could hardly be called progressive it could fairly be called liberal. In the third section of the sermon the preacher made a distinct contribution to our thinking on Christian unity. His thought here was of the finest liberal type. If one will carefully read only so much as the short extract appearing on the cover of this issue of The Christian Century one will feel the liberalizing effect of the preacher's message.

The implications, both sentimental and doctrinal, of the thesis that Christian union is a problem of persons, not of doctrines nor schemes, are far reaching. This portion of the sermon showed a liberal mind, a rare insight and a fineness of feeling that justifies the speaker's reputation as the poet-preacher.

The earlier portion of the sermon lays itself open to just criticism. The distinction between the plane of authority and the plane of wisdom is not, to us, as to some critics who have expressed themselves, a barren one. We agree with Mr. McLellan that there are some problems that are to be settled on the plane of authority, but it would seem ridiculous, if it were not really so regrettable, that under a great thesis like that he should have specified but one subject and that the subject of baptism by immersion! How can Mr. McLellan, who in the last division of his sermon proves his ability to hold things together in a perspective of remarkable breadth and richness, allow a mere ritualistic detail to eclipse for him the tremendous problems of the moral order and the spiritual nature of man, problems which are solved for us, if they are solved at all, by the authority of Christ?

Mr. McLellan here had an opportunity to erase the arbitrary and ever disputed line between the planes of authority and wisdom, between faith and opinion, and to draw a rationally determined line there, to show plainly why the big, fundamental questions of life must be settled by authority and to show how our Lord never broke down his reserve with respect to those considerations which man's wisdom was competent to deal with. Such an interpretation would have been an original and illuminating contribution bearing directly upon the defection of the anti-organ section of Disciples, upon the delegate convention problem which the Louisville convention was then facing, and upon the question of baptism by immersion. All these questions could be shown to belong not to the realm of authority, but to that of wisdom.

Mr. McLellan's sermon is open to just criticism not alone for its lack of perspective at this point, but for its inaccuracy. He refers to what he calls an "attack" now being made upon the Disciples' position which he describes as follows:

> This attack, while made at two points, is really one in its animus and purpose. Simplified, it is that the Disciples, in insisting on the primitive conditions of the gospel, and on a Scriptural basis for Christian union, are out of harmony with modern thought and feeling. The specially objectionable feature in our position is our baptism. It is stated that we cannot hope to bring Christendom to our view as long as we hold to this position and especially to this baptism. This is the new voice among our people. I think it cowardice to pretend not to hear it.

In listening to Mr. McLellan we wondered to whom he referred. Who is there among the Disciples who affirms that the Disciples are "out of harmony with modern thought and feeling"—

In insisting upon the primitive conditions of the gospel?

In insisting upon a scriptural basis for Christian union?

Who is there among the Disciples who objects to "our baptism?"

Where is it "stated" that "we cannot hope to bring Christendom to our view so long as we hold . . . to this baptism?"

The Christian Century has said some things about baptism which have been misquoted in such a way as to give the impression that this paper held an attitude answering to that described by Mr. McLellan, but this paper takes occasion now to declare that it holds to the exact opposite of the items named by Mr. McLellan. We believe that "modern thought and feeling" positively demand—

Insistence upon the primitive conditions of the gospel and,

Insistence upon a Scriptural basis of union.

We deny that modern thought and feeling find any reasonable objection to "our baptism" and certainly The Christian Century finds no objection at all to it.

And we further affirm that in order for us to bring Christendom to our view of Christian unity it is highly important for us to keep right on practicing baptism precisely as we have practiced it for one hundred years.

It would be edifying to the brethren should Mr. McLellan say specifically whom he referred to as speaking in this new voice which it is "cowardice to pretend not to hear."

We write earnestly because we write representatively. In its endeavor to interpret the forward-going movement of the Disciples, The Century strives in good conscience to speak accurately and to protect the movement from those who would interpret it as hostile either to the Disciples' ideals or to evangelical convictions. If there is a new voice among the Disciples saying what Mr. McLellan declares he plainly hears, then let it be said bluntly that that voice is disloyal both to the Disciples' ideals and to evangelical Christianity.

To charge that there are those among us who are willing "to make any sort of compromise where the authority of Jesus is involved" is to charge that there are those among us who are infidel. And being infidel they ought to be pointed out more clearly, that all may be duly warned.

Serious language like this was used in an address on Monday after the convention by a ranting evangelist; in that case it is unworthy of being replied to. But appearing in the superlative convention sermon of Mr. McLellan, so thoroughly prepared at all other points, so fine, so facile, so fair, so deferential, so marked by intellectual chivalry, it seems that the occasion, the context, and the man speaking, all lay upon us the duty to say a word in defense of those upon whom the reflection of his inaccurate allusions is bound to fall.

Wisconsin's State Insurance Act

Of the progressive states, when it comes to a count of things actually accomplished, Wisconsin stands close to the front. Many of the laws she has passed for the benefit of the poor man and the relief of those most in need would be rejected almost without support in many states. One of the most radical of all Wisconsin laws, providing for state life insurance, recently went into effect. The object of this act is to give the people absolutely safe insurance. It was thought the plan would appeal to those who distrust insurance companies in the same way that the postal savings bank appeals to many who distrust commercial banks. The insurance act is without precedent in the United States, and other states are closely following the experiment. According to the Wisconsin plan, the insurance is open to any citizen of Wisconsin between the ages of twenty and fifty who enjoys normal health. The applicant must pass a physical examination as in the case of the commercial insurance company. He can then choose from any of the five plans of insurance offered.

Christianity's Best Argument

By Charles S. Medbury

EDITORS NOTE: It is doubtful if any other man in a Disciples' convention could have so delicately woven into his address the intimate personal history of a Church leader as did Dr. Charles S. Medbury when at the Louisville convention he opened up the book of Rev. Grant K. Lewis' childhood and revealed him as a living illustration of Christian benevolence. It was done with extraordinary tenderness and insight and reserve. Mr. Lewis' brethren are grateful to Dr. Medbury for telling them this story of a man they have come to love and honor, and their affection for him will henceforth be enhanced and enriched as they add to his outstanding personal virtues the idealism of the great cause of which he is a living symbol. The address by Dr. Medbury was delivered in behalf of the National Benevolent Association whose purpose and ministries are today gripping the hearts of the Disciples with a firmer grip than did the dogmas of yesterday.

Christianity has often lost by our defences of it. What it asks is to be given a chance to defend itself. It asks to live, and it does live incarnate, in benevolence. Men may argue against doctrines and may ridicule rituals but no argument remains and certainly no ridicule, when a homeless child is provided for or dependent age protected. In the presence of such ministry skeptics and cynics can say no more than in the olden days when he that was healed stood by. The joy of a child turned from tears to laughter, the peace of the aged lifted above care for daily bread and granted kindness, the comfort of the sick and aged made to forget bodies of pain in gladness of heart—this is a ministry that none can question and when done in the name of the Lord it gives Him place again in the very pathway of the needs of men.

Benevolence in All Lands.

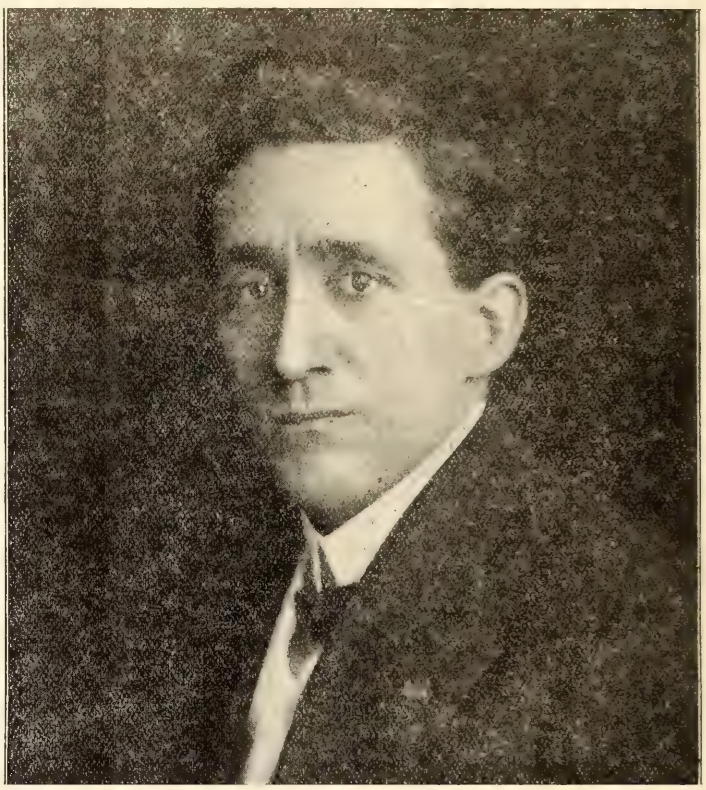
And let it be noted distinctly that it is not only benevolence in the homeland for which this address appeals, but that the call is for this Christ-like ministry in every nation of the earth. But the strange thing to be faced is that we who grant at once the power of this ministry in lands afar, and rejoice profoundly in orphanages for the children of other nations, are sometimes pitifully slow to recognize the need of just such work at home. We know the value of redeemed and trained childhood abroad, but often fail to recognize the closed gates of prejudice that child hands will unlock at home. And so of the care of the aged, there and here. One of the triumphs of our foreign work in which we glory most is its securing, in many a land, tenderness toward the aged who, till the Master comes, are accounted in the way and subjected to all manner of maltreatment. Yet at home we are just beginning to understand our duty and to call forth by gifts of love the gratitude of the aged at our doors.

The Best Plea for Unity.

As a people we are intent upon the unity of th forces of God. All Christendom will listen when great life speaks. We long to reach for Christ the great of earth—the rich and powerful. We plan in every way to reach the masses—the toilers of earth and the struggling. These often have little time to hear us preach and they have no heart for our philosophies, but there is a language they can understand and there is a message they will heed. The love of God in concrete human helpfulness will break down every barrier. This was the secret of the wondrous tributes voiced in the hour of the burial of General William Booth. The praise of the helped could not be withheld. The honor of all, of high and low estate, had to find voice. Had law commanded silence, love would have cried aloud from the stones of the streets of London.

Jesus' Choice.

The benevolence that throws a sign across windows amid brothels of Chicago—"His blood can make the vilest clean"—the benevolence that sends Harold Begbies' Angel Adjutant to the home of Old Born Drunk—the benevolence that takes the crying child half starved and cold and alone—not understanding why—and gives it food and warmth and love, such benevolence finds pathways opened of God to the hearts of men everywhere, the royal highways that reveal the divine image and likeness. Where eloquence is given impatient hearing, where ritual is scorned, where "evidences" fail utterly to move and party shibboleths leave men cold as ice, benevolence speaks and men of high and low estate give eager heed. Had Jesus thrown himself from the pinnacle of the temple it would have been the sensation of an hour. He chose rather to give sight to the blind, strength to the lame, cleansing to the leper, hearing to the deaf, life to the dead and the gospel to the poor. And today he who would create a legitimate and enduring sensation for God may well follow in the Master's footsteps. There is no such way to gain a hearing for the Lord. There is nothing comparable in Christ's defence. Without the slightest question benevolence is indeed the supreme apologetic.



Rev. Charles S. Medbury, D. D.

A Living Illustration.

As to what is possible in human life in this sacred way where Christian nurture is given to the orphan child, there is a story to be told almost too sacred to pass my lips and yet which I am privileged to tell because I assured an honored servant of our God among us that it might help to open to some other little life the blessings which came to this man's childhood. Years ago in northern Indiana loving parents died leaving a family of children of whom one, the lad before me now, was under six years of age.

This little fellow, for several years, was taken first into one home and then into another of the family relationship, but in every one of these homes perhaps there were already about as many cares as could be borne, and the child, without mother or father, grew to feel himself that somehow there was little place for him and he was more or less in the way. And this is said, not in unkindness, but in recognition of the burden relatives were bearing before the care of orphan children came to be pressed upon them. But after a time a home of strangers opened wide its doors of love and gave its whole heart to the boy whose fortunes we are following. Dear lives, well known to me, poured out their affection in longing plans for the child's good. A new name was given under the law, and treasures of education in books of men and the Book of God were granted richly.

Orphan Child Becomes Minister.

By and by this sweet Christian home had the reward of seeing the child of their faith and love stand in the pulpit of the old home church, proclaiming the gospel of Christ.

And then, as the years passed, the service to the world increased. A great state called this splendid man to a place of prominence and honor. And when, in 1909, the brotherhood in mighty convention assembled, cast about for those equipped to lead in our work of the evangelization of America, two men were called to this mighty enterprise and one was Grant K. Lewis, our orphan boy of years agone—the servant of all the Churches now.

May it not be that when this noble man speaks his unusual message of power to our people that in himself he may stand as the incarnate plea of our benevolence! And may not the precious home that has given such a life to us all, prove an inspiration to multitudes of other homes at whose doors tiny hands are knocking, and for whose love and care the hearts of little ones are starving? Already our Association has placed in childless homes, 3323 homeless children. Who can tell what message these will bear to the great needy world in the morrow? God speed the day when not a child that needs us shall ask in vain the blessings that our brotherhood can give.

The Larger Prayer.

At first I prayed for Light:
Could I but see the way,
How gladly, swiftly would I walk
To everlasting day!

And next I prayed for Strength
That I might tread the road
With firm, unfaltering feet, and win
The heaven's serene abode.

And then I asked for Faith:
Could I but trust my God,
I'd live enfolded in his peace,
Though foes were all abroad.

But now I pray for Love:
Deep love to God and man;
A living Love that will not fail,
However dark his plan.

And Light and Strength and Faith
Are opening everywhere!
God only waited for me till
I prayed the larger prayer.

Hyde Park Church's Self-Sacrifice

Sentiments of Trusted Disciple Leaders on Pastor's Proposal for Ending Sarvis Case

EDITORS' NOTE: When Professor Ames, minister of Hyde Park church, Chicago, read his statement to the Louisville convention severing the "living link" tie between his church and Prof. Guy Sarvis, missionary teacher in the University of Nanking, China, the convention sat silent for the moment with inhibited impulses. Whether to applaud it as a generous Christian act, or to arise in indignant protest against paying the price of such a sacrifice to a discredited and defeated newspaper was not clear to the surprised multitude until the act was interpreted by Rev. Wallace Tharp, Rev. J. B. Briney, Rev. W. H. Book and others who urged the convention to accept it as a settlement of the so-called Sarvis case. In the spirit of accepting a sacrifice the convention voted "aye" unanimously and with great emotion. Mr. Sarvis will remain in China, supported by Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Doan, of Nelsonville, O. Mr. Doan is the widely known teacher of one of the largest men's Bible classes in the country. The Hyde Park church is manifesting a disposition of concurrence in the position taken by its pastor though not without keen sense of the great cost to itself. The congregation hopes to be able to make its offering to the Foreign Society as large as though it went direct to Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis. On no phase of the episode, save only the magnanimity of Dr. Ames and his church, does The Christian Century care at this time to pronounce an opinion. Our readers will be interested, however, in the following opinions expressed by well-known and trusted leaders.

BY REV. WALLACE THARP.
Pittsburgh, Pa.

Dr. E. S. Ames has crowned himself with the finest crown a man can wear on earth—the crown of a noble, heroic, chivalrous, Christian self-renunciation and self-abnegation on behalf of a great cause and a great apprehension. So beautiful, sublime and intense was the thing that he did that I believe in my soul it should be permitted to rest in its thronely, lofty place untouched, uncommented upon and alone.

Here this whole question and controversy should rest. God opened a great way for us in a tense and trying hour. Not to have walked in it would have been to be blind or mean.

Now that we have tenderly, tearfully, prayerfully walked in it, I should count that man an enemy of God who would seek to breathe other than an expression of deepest gratitude and praise. It is now a time for praise, prayer and earnest work, and for nothing else.

May the great All Father bless every one of us.

BY REV. BURRIS A. JENKINS.
Kansas City, Mo.

I hope that Dr. Ames' statement will be accepted in the Christ-like spirit in which it was made; and that it will end the whole matter. My heart bleeds for the Hyde Park Church and the Sarvises; but if the incident is closed, the sacrifice will not have been made in vain. There has been no compromise of intellectual conviction or liberty on either side.

BY REV. W. F. RICHARDSON.
Kansas City.

The very magnanimous act of Bro. Edward S. Ames, in voluntarily withdrawing his church from its living link relationship to our Foreign Society, solely in the interest of harmony among our brethren, ought to meet with most sincere appreciation on the part of us all. Most of all ought it lead to immediate cessation of the attacks upon our Foreign Society, and the trusting of the Executive Committee in charge of our foreign missionary work to administer that work with such loyalty to our Lord as the high standing of its members give us a right to expect. Meanwhile, Bro. Ames has set an example of Christian love and self surrender that will be returned by an increased confidence and affection on the part of his brethren.

BY REV. EDGAR DE WITT JONES
Bloomington, Ill.

I shall be a long time forgetting the move ment in the convention when Dr. Ames read his now historic statement. The nobility of that act melted me; it was simply splendid. If such an act done in so Christly a spirit and at such a great cost will not melt our hitherto divergent and hostile groups into oneness of love nothing else will or can. I believe it will. I believe the event was epochal and I was never prouder of identification with the Disciples of Christ than in this golden month of October in the year of our Lord 1912.

BY REV. C. M. CHILTON.
St. Joseph, Mo.

I have been very busy this year and have given little attention to the Sarvis question. I have been willing to leave the selection of missionaries with the board to which we have intrusted it. Besides, I have believed that if Mr. Sarvis is not a worthy representative of our cause in Nanking, such missionaries as Macklin and Meigs and others we have there, will soon find it out and ask for his recall. As to the statement of Mr. Ames, I was glad to hear him make it; I have cherished his friendship since our college days. I trust the statement will accomplish all the good he desired.

BY REV. W. N. BRINEY.
Louisville, Ky.

For the sake of peace in the brotherhood, and that the Foreign Society might not suffer further handicap in its great work, Mr. Ames has made a noble concession, and one that reveals the heroic Christian spirit of the man. His splendid action will go far toward clearing up a situation most disturbing and perplexing to the churches. The problem, it seems to some of us, has not yet been wholly solved, but the spirit manifested by all those so deeply concerned, gives hope that the Sarvis matter will be adjusted finally to the satisfaction of all. If the spirit of the Master shall continue to prevail among us as it dominated the momentous Saturday morning session of the Louisville convention, we need have little fear concerning the ultimate disposal of this matter.

BY REV. E. L. POWELL.
Louisville, Ky.

One of the most notable victories through concession without compromise on either side was that achieved by the action of the convention in the Sarvis matter. No more magnanimous or Christian thing has been done than that done by Dr. Edward Scribner Ames of the Hyde Park Church for the sake of harmony. He promised the convention in utmost sincerity to seek to influence the Hyde Park congregation to release itself from any Living Link relation with the Foreign Society, thereby surrendering Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis to be supported by other churches or individuals. Perhaps it was the best solution of the difficulty although some of us felt that it would have been more desirable to approve the action of the Foreign Society in the employment of Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis. The spirit of the convention was such as to have unanimously approved such a motion.

BY REV. JAMES M. PHILPUTT.
New York City.

The Disciples have demonstrated that they can rise above party strife and settle their differences in the spirit of love and magnanimity. We all honor Dr. Ames for the noble sacrifice he made in the interests of peace. Let us hope the fruit of it may abide and that never again shall the controversy be opened. Mr. Sarvis is still to remain at his post in the field, and in the employ of the Foreign Society. The Hyde Park Church is to continue to give for Foreign Missions, but the particular bone of contention is removed, i. e., the connection with and the support of Mr. Sarvis by the Hyde Park Church. No principle is sacrificed, and yet the situation is cleared up and adjusted to the satisfaction of both sides.

BY REV. A R. MOORE.
Savannah, Ga.

The action today on the part of Dr. Ames in voluntarily withdrawing the Hyde Park Church from the "living link" relationship with the Foreign Society was gracious, beautiful and Christian. It was met by Bro. Briney and other opponents in a like, gracious spirit and was welcomed by the convention as the end of the Sarvis controversy. In due time Mr. Sarvis will no doubt return to America and the happy ending of this unfortunate affair will leave the Foreign Society stronger than ever and the church thoroughly united. "Growing pains" of the church are often distressing, but when borne in a Christlike spirit, as in the climax of this case the church is left bigger and stronger.

BY REV. R. P. SHEPHERD.
St. Louis, Mo.

The fellowship of the Disciples of Christ was enriched by the action of Professor Ames. For the sake of unbroken harmony others besides Dr. Ames must refrain from saying all that is in their hearts concerning the situation so graciously resolved by his action. The incident was a triumph of Christian courtesy. God grant that this is the end of bitter personalities among brethren who must win the world by love and not by loveless controversies.

BY MR. R. A. DOAN.
Nelsonville, Ohio.

The statement made by Prof. Ames before the mass meeting Saturday breathed the very spirit of Christ regardless of what he believes.

Under the circumstances, since the severence of the living link connection did not involve the recall of Mr. Sarvis or question his relationship with the Foreign society, it was perhaps best to accept the offer.

I am not unconscious of the heartaches it must have caused but that must be forgotten in the greater good accomplished.

[Before leaving the convention Mr. and Mrs. Doan offered to support Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis as their own "living-links" and their proposal was accepted by the Society.—The Editors.]

BY REV. PETER AINSLIE.
Baltimore, Md.

It is always a great moment when a man rises to the occasion. It is not given to all men to do this, but Dr. Ames proved the greatness of his soul in meeting the issue. I love him for it. It is true that while it was a mere technicality, yet it promises to set at peace a long and unpleasant controversy. If there be any who think he was unwise in making this concession for the peace of the church, I would count those brethren out of the pale of advisers in the best things that pertain to the Kingdom of God, and those who desire the peace of the church will not make capital of the occurrence. Talk little about it, but pray much for the men involved in the whole controversy.

BY REV. EARLE WILFLEY.
Washington, D. C.

The mass meeting on Saturday morning of the Louisville convention was an occasion fraught with great perils and possibilities. After full discussion the meeting adopted, with a surprising degree of harmony, an innocent and exceedingly moderate form of constitution for a delegate convention. Then followed the gracious act of Dr. Ames of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, who, in a modest and direct statement offered to urge his congregation to relinquish their living link relation with Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis. It was a tense moment of deepest interest with a touch of pathos in it all. Thus without passion or bitterness a grave crisis was passed and our people again showed themselves equal to a situation of supreme importance.

The action of this meeting may not silence all controversy, but it at least cleared the atmosphere of bitterness and suspicion. Should there be further discussion of the matter it must be upon a higher plane and with a kindlier spirit. But let us pray that this is the end of the whole unlovely business and engage what gift and graces we may have in furthering the course of the Master.

BY REV. BERNARD GRUENSTEIN.
Sewanee, Tenn.

I sat close in front of Dr. Ames when he made his statement to the convention and looked straight into the eye of the man. Somehow I was conscious of a dynamic struggle going on in his soul. Perhaps it was the same sort of struggle that the Lord Jesus felt in the wilderness. I wonder yet if the haggard expression I caught was not the outward mark of that moral struggle. There was no oratory; not a gesture did he make. It was nothing but a simple, unaffected statement he made, but it was a statement born, to my mind, of a profound spiritual experience. There was no quiver in the voice; rather it was almost colorless. The self-possession and the wonderful self-mastery of this real man of God hushed thousands into a sort of awe as gradually the significance of it dawned upon our minds. I could not help praying within my own soul for more manhood of that fine quality throughout our churches.

Dr. Ames has made his statement. The statement does not change a single physical or moral fact in the whole Sarvis case, but it changes the spiritual temper with which that case may be regarded. Dr. Ames did not know it, but he became the man of the hour. May his tribe increase.

BY REV. O. P. SPIEGEL.
Montgomery, Ala.

Without entering into the merits or demerits of the Hyde Park Church of Chicago, in its spiritual standing before God, I feel that Brother Ames' action before the mass meeting was most commendable as a way of removing the unfortunate friction from the ongoings of the Disciples of Christ. I now hope all unpleasant discussion may cease.

Personally, I am more than willing for Brother Sarvis to be thoroughly tried out on the mission field, for if he preach not Christ and baptize believers he will not long endure the filth, disease, isolation incident to his high calling; or his brethren in China will request his recall if he be not true to Christ and to his brethren. Let our Zion have peace.

BY REV. B. A. ABBOTT.
St. Louis, Mo.

I do not hold some of the views Dr. Ames seems to entertain but I regret the turn matters took. Although the spirit displayed was sincerely Christian, it is not best for a convention to deal with such questions. Dr. Ames' conduct under the circumstances showed him to be a lofty soul, an unselfish man—a Christian with whom fellowship could have no dangers but many blessings.

BY REV. ROBERT GRAHAM FRANK.
Liberty, Mo.

I have a feeling of gratification and humiliation over the final outcome of the Ames-Sarvis matter. I am gratified at the possible peace that may come to us, and humiliated over our willingness to let one man be sacrificed as the price of this peace rather than our courageous taking the matter in our own hands and expressing either our approval or disapproval of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. I hope however that Dr. Ames and his heroic church will feel that they have a larger place in our hearts by reason of their unselfish and beautifully Christian spirit than they have ever had.

BY REV. H. D. C. MACLACHLAN.
Richmond, Va.

History has been made at this convention. Two things have been demonstrated—first, that heresy-trials are an impossibility among the Disciples; and second that large acts of self-sacrifice are the true and final solution of all spiritual problems. In the renunciation of Dr. Ames and the Hyde Park Church an example has been set in the spirit of the cross which may well serve as an ideal for many conventions to come. The Foreign Missionary Society is stronger than ever before; and while it would be too much to expect all opposition to its large-minded Christian policy altogether to cease, it is henceforth secure in the hearts of a great truth-loving free people. The victory was for neither side in the controversy, but for the Prince of Peace. We must not make Dr. Ames' sacrifice a barren one.

The truth that yesterday was mine is larger truth today:
Its face has aspect more divine, its kinship fuller sway.
For truth must grow as ages roll, and God looms large upon the soul.

A Chinese Thomas Campbell

By Bernard Gruenstein

I have just read a stirring plea for the union of some 300,000 Chinese Christians of various Protestant names, in a statesmanlike paper occupying first place in the July number of The International Review of Missions, a quarterly of the highest significance and importance. I read the article almost breathlessly, looked at the curious musical name over it ever so many times to be sure that I was the victim of no illusion, and then read it again, studying every word and phrase of it. The article is entitled "The Chinese Church in Relation to Its Immediate Task." Its author's name struck the present writer with something of an intellectual shock. It was a Chinese name. With propriety, other things being equal, it might have been the name of Thomas Campbell.

Like Thomas Campbell's Writings.

If you can imagine Mr. Campbell rising from his grave and taking the first steamer to China; if you can imagine Mr. Campbell going from one Chinese province to another, looking over the fields and the stations and the preaching points: if you can imagine Mr. Campbell interviewing foreign missionaries, teachers, doctors, church officers, church members; and if you can imagine Mr. Campbell going back to his quarters to write an article for a journal like The International Review of Missions, you can then very well imagine Mr. Campbell writing just such an article as Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi has written. Not only has this Chinese Christian scholar, observer and churchman written what we can very well imagine Mr. Campbell might have written under the same circumstances, but he has actually proceeded, according to reputable report, to carry out his "ground plan or strategical policy" of Christian union into actual practice in the city of Pekin.

Member Continuation Committee.

I know nothing of Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi beyond the printed facts that he is a minister, and that he is one of the thirty-four members of the Continuation Committee of the World Missionary Conference, Edinburgh, 1910. But this is sufficient. While of course that Continuation Committee is in nowise responsible for either the utterances or the activities of Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi, whom the present writer regards as the Thomas Campbell of China, yet the fact that he is the one Chinese representative on that Committee leads us to the conclusion that there is much weight in every word he writes, marked as it is not only with a broad outlook but with a keen insight. There is as much caution in what he writes as there is breadth of view. He has both patience and vision, a rare combination indeed.

Christianity Appealed to for Aid.

The author's thesis is that in the present constructional or transitional crisis of China, Christianity is called upon to render assistance. "How she is prepared to face the situation is the problem today," he says, after cautioning the reader that "a new China, however, does not necessarily mean a better China." Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi then observes that few see the church as a whole and in its entirety. But he is not disposed to find fault: "The Christian religion has passed from the period of the China Mission into the period of the China Church." From remark he changes into prophecy: "And it will slowly but surely pass from the period of the Church in China to that of the Church of China." There is a sweeping prophecy in his vision in that one statement that would have been almost impossible of utterance even twelve years ago, the Boxer period of the empire.

Must be United Church.

And now Ch'eng Ching-Yi's reflections change, and he boldly declares that "the Chinese Church should be a united Church." What Thomas Campbell saw, no doubt with different spectacles, in the early nineteenth century in America, Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi as clearly sees now in the early twentieth century. I do not know the affiliations or the environments, intellectually or religiously, of the Chinese writer and reformer. I do not know if Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi ever even heard of Rev. Thomas Campbell. But be that as it may, the same profound spirit animates both: one an American of the nineteenth century, the other a Chinese of the twentieth. The same Christ is regnant in both. The same forces of spiritual and social evolution are sweeping through both. The Chinese, perhaps on a different line of reasoning clearly sees now what the American so clearly saw then. What better testimony to the universality of Christ could be borne than this? He is the same yesterday, today and forever, in Palestine, in Rome, in Gaul, in Britain, in America, in China. There is a Campbellian ring in the challenge of Ch'eng Ching-Yi, as he writes: "There was, and is, no necessity for introducing Church division to the East, and there is every reason to believe the Church would have been better developed if such divisions had been non-existent. The vital oneness of the Church of Christ, is one of its special features." If that is not exactly the position of the Declaration and Address, then words utterly fail to convey what is that position.

To Wear Name of Christ Only.

But Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi becomes radically more specific than this in the direction of our historic plea. The Chinese author among other points actually proceeds to specify what in his judgment the united Chinese Church shall be named. He wants one name for the one Church. If there is any doubt of our propriety in calling him the Thomas Campbell of China, then at once let that doubt vanish under the spell of his radical suggestion in his own unmistakable language: "The name of the Chinese Church should be known throughout the land as 'The Chinese Christian Church,' and the separate parts distinguished from each other only by the location which the Church occupies, as 'The Chinese Christian Church of Peking.'"

That Mr. Ch'eng Ching-Yi has evidently acted on his own suggestion, much in the same way that both the Campbells acted on their own suggestions, is clearly to be seen by the following report, which I clip from The Continent of September 19, 1912:

"CHINESE CHURCH INDEPENDENCE MANIFESTED."

"A new token of the independent spirit which possesses the progressive Chinese of the present day, as well as a sign of Chinese impatience with western denominational distinctions, is the organization of the Chinese Christian Church of Peking, which has been formed with the object of maintaining a self-governing and self-supporting union church comprising all denominations of Christians now represented in the Chinese capital. The chief mover in this undertaking is Cheng Ching Yi [Ch'eng Ching-Yi], who is the Chinese representative on the great world-encircling continuation committee of the Edinburgh missionary conference.

"The constitution of this church is a brief but remarkably comprehensive document. It declares that the object of the church is 'to preach according to the word of God the gospel of salvation,' its faith 'accepts the evangelical and trinitarian creeds of the recognized Protestant churches' and its policy is 'to train the Chinese to undertake their responsibility as Christians.' The union proposes to recognize 'the existing rules and rites' of the churches already organized in Peking 'as far as these may be in keeping with scriptural teaching.' The constitution also binds the new body to pay special attention to the promotion of foreign missionary work 'besides home missionary work.'

"The lay officers of local congregations are to be elders caring for the spiritual welfare of the church and deacons in charge of business matters. Foreign missionaries are to constitute an advisory board, but are not to have votes in the governing body. The veteran Dr. W. A. P. Martin looks upon this movement as most helpful and promising. The dependence of Christianity on foreigners has hitherto been, in Dr. Martin's own phrase, 'an astounding obstacle,' and he thoroughly believes that the body of Chinese will look upon the religion of Jesus with far more respect when they find it represented in an absolutely independent native organization."

Should Cheer Our Hearts.

What this Chinese scholar and churchman has said and apparently done ought to cheer the hearts of those who yearn for the united church. The Disciples of Christ can never abandon their mission in the world so long as such a plea as ours for Christian union can take hold like that in the Far East. For my part, I am content in the growing knowledge that our plea for Christian union is as practicable as it is simple. If Chinese churches with all their disadvantages can work it out, why cannot the American churches with all their advantages work it out with the same love and loyalty to him who prayed that we might all be one, even as he and the Father are one?

A novelist was taking an automobile trip through New England. On the side of a hill he came on an old man seated beside a tiny house much older than he. Above, on what appeared to be an almost perpendicular ledge, there was growing a beautiful field of grain. "How did you get that grain up there?" the author asked the old man. "Shot it with a musket!" was the rejoiner. "Is that the truth?" "No, that's conversation."—The Sun.

A young first-grade teacher of the children of foreign parents gave them a little talk on kindness to animals. The next day, when she was busy at her desk, she felt a little hand tugging at her sleeve. "Why, Pietro," she exclaimed, "what is the matter?" "Nothing, teacher. I just wanted to tell you how I was good to dumb animals yesterday," he replied. "Why, isn't that nice, Pietro! Just what did you do?" Pietro drew himself up to his full three feet, and proudly declared, "I kissed the cat;"—San Francisco Chronicle.

"Miss Gray, do you think you ought to ask me such a question? Answer it out of your own heart. I have no business to advise you in such a matter."

Lucy Gray gave him one searching look, as her face flamed.

"Give me the letter," was all she said.

Elijah handed it to her, and in some way their fingers touched as Lucy took the letter, and then she deliberately tore it into bits and scattered the pieces down upon the top of the log.

A sudden light came into Elijah Clifford's eyes.

"Is that your answer to it?" he said, moving over on the log a little nearer to Lucy.

"Yes," she answered, and it is a historical fact that she did not move back any. But she said afterwards that she was sitting near the end of the log and couldn't have moved far without falling off and that Elijah knew it.

"Then you don't need my advice? What made you ask for it?"

Lucy Gray, prim schoolma'am as she had called herself, answered between crying and laughing, "Oh, I don't care for him. Why, he is only twenty-four and I am twenty-eight. And I can never leave these people here. I am so in love with them."

"With all of them?" asked Elijah desperately.

"Yes. But with some more than others."

Again a light came into Clifford's face as he moved up a little nearer. The bits of paper which had been poor Walter's letter began to fall over the sides of the log. But Elijah Clifford was pale as he said:

"Lucy, I dont want to make another mistake. I have not been able to conceal my feeling for you and I realize the great distance between us when it comes to education. I'm not college-bred. And no one feels it more than I do. But I'm not to old to learn. I'm only thirty. And I find my brain works pretty well when I have a motive. I can almost read Herrmann und Dorothea. And I've committed no end of Heine. I can say 'Die schonste die Jungfrauen sitszet, Dort oben wunderbar' and a lot more. But —I don't dare ask you again to be my wife unless—unless—I can be sure that the differences between us will not make you unhappy. But, oh, if this happiness could be mine! You cannot love these people more than I do. Or yearn over them more. And we are not so far apart after all."

"I'm sure," said Lucy Gray, looking up at him, tears flowing down her cheeks, "I'm sure, Elijah, that we are not so very far apart in any way. And if you want to be happy I am sure—"

She did not need to say any more. Elijah Clifford saw hapipness looking into his eyes out of hers and he would have been very much lacking in education if he had not then and there claimed his own.

They did not hear Mr. and Mrs. Masters approach because sand does not echo under people's feet, but they heard Mr. Masters say to his wife:

"I'm sorry we left the kodak up at the house. I've been hoping and praying for this for the last two years. And now my prayers have been answered, I would like to have some record of the fact."

Elijah Clifford and Lucy Gray stood up side by side. They were not embarrassed nor confused. The light of heaven seemed to shine on them out of that Thanksgiving Day glow in the desert sky. Their happiness had a sacred divine atmosphere about it that checked even as joyful a word of congratulation as Mr. Masters was about to speak. Ansa had come running down from the mission and seeing Miss Gray and Clifford there she had come up and put her little hands one in each of theirs.

"Ah!" cried Masters. "This is the picture we want!" while Lucy and Elijah standing there by Ansa spoke of the years they were now to live together in the sacred union of husband and wife, consecrated heart and mind to the love of a neglected people, their human happiness intensified and purified by the service they were to give as one in answer to that which spoke to them even louder than their own earthly love—the sound of the High Calling.

If, as is easy for the writer and reader, we agree to let a few years slip by, as they have a way of doing whether we wish to let them or not, we shall find ourselves again in Milton at the home of the Douglases.

It is Thanksgiving Day again and Esther seems to have even more than the usual happy look on her face as she says to Helen:

"Isn't it remarkable that Walter coming up from the Isthmus is going to bring Bauer with him from Berlin? The world is getting smaller every day."

"We must learn to say 'Professor' Bauer, mother. You know Walter wrote that he has several honorary degrees conferred on him for his inventions. I understand he is held in high respect at all the universities."

"He will never be anything but plain Felix Bauer to me, Helen. And I hope his honors have not spoiled him. I don't believe they could."

Helen is silent as she sits down by the window which commands a view of the front walk. Time has dealt generously and kindly with her. The girlhood has ripened into the stately strong womanhood. Many suitors have come and gone, among them some noble gentlemen who have received their answers from her with sore hearts, but Helen still has not seen her ideal of the romantic days and her heart is yet—she says to herself—free—at least she has refused both wealth and high character for the vision she has cherished all these years of the nameless one who, so far, she says, has never appeared to her. And all through this testing, refining process of growth, she has developed into a spirit of rare strength and grace, of whom Paul and Esther have been increasingly proud.

Two young men come briskly up the walk. Mrs. Douglas opens the door and rushes out on the porch as Helen rises to tell her they are coming.

Walter laughingly lifts Esther off her feet as he kisses her and then turns to Helen. Evidently he has not broken his heart over that romance in the desert.

First greetings over he announced Bauer just as Paul steps into the front room.

"Professor Felix Bauer, F. R. G. S., F. S. S. K. L. G. X. Y. Z. and others. Isn't he great?"

Esther simply says, "Felix, welcome. I do not know how to say 'professor.'"

Bauer lifts her hands to his lips. Helen looks at him as if she were seeing some new vision at a distance. Felix Bauer smiles in the old way and says:

"Mrs. Douglas, I don't care for these titles. I would gladly give a bushel of them for one kind word from Walter's mother."

He looks at Helen as he speaks and Helen notes his clear, strong accent and the self-control and ease of a man who has met the world and looked it in the face without fear and without shame.

It is only when they are seated at the table that Helen has opportunity to note Bauer's strong face and figure, and wonder at the transformation time and testing have made in him. He still speaks in the slow deliberate fashion of the other days, but he is a full-grown man now, conscious of power and Helen has to readjust her picture of him as she last saw him.

As the talk goes on, Paul's probing questions, aided by Walter and his mother, bring out the facts about Bauer which his own modesty would keep in the background.

Sent to Berlin to make special studies of new methods in lighting, he had made the startling discovery of the formula of the fire-fly's secret, and revolutionized the entire system of city lighting. He had been careless of wealth. Walter drops a hint of thousands given to pay off old family indebtedness, or charities aided, of new enterprises fostered until Bauer blushingly begs him to stop.

"Really, Mr. Douglas, I am no millionaire as Walter would make out. Only I have been permitted to help some this great tuberculosis movement that has been a great joy to me."

Helen catches the vision of consecrated wealth and looks at Bauer again. Then later when they are seated in front of the old hearth and the lights have been turned on while a heavy snow falls outside, Bauer in his turn receives a surprise from her.

He has referred to the old days and recurred to the many kindnesses shown to him by Esther and Helen and the mission workers at Tolchaco. He is delighted to hear of the marriage of Clifford and Miss Gray, but in all the reminiscent talk he is evidently preoccupied and looks often at Helen as a hungry and thirsty man would eye the full table from which he may be debarred.

The clock strikes a late hour. He makes a feeble excuse to go and mutter something about not having observed the time.

"Die Uhr schlagt keinem Gluecklichen?" Helen smilingly observes.

Bauer starts in surprise and leans over towards her.

"You speak German?" he asks with a strange look on his face.

"I have had plenty of time to learn it since you left us."

He looks up and sees that the other members of the family have in some way become much interested in Walter's new plans of

SHALL CHRISTIANS TITHE?

In one of the Conferences at the recent National Convention in Louisville, the question of tithing was discussed. Several of those present warmly favored it, and urged the issuing of new propaganda for its general adoption by the church. Others questioned its suitability to social and industrial conditions at the present day—among them, was the editor of this page. Some of the reasons that had led to this conclusion are embodied in the following article.

The tithe had been practiced by Abraham and Jacob, but it was first placed in the Jewish code by Moses. It consisted of one-tenth of the annual profit of land, stock, or labor, and was paid for the maintenance of the Levites, as a compensation for their services in the temple. Of course, we all understand that it is only as Old Testament legislation harmonizes with the teachings and ideals of Jesus that it can be a rule for citizens of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Tithing Not in New Testament.

In the New Testament, tithing is never mentioned. There is no record of it in the history of the Christian Church until the fourth and fifth centuries, when tithes were imposed by Church Councils for the support of the clergy. The system did not become firmly established until the ninth century—since then, it has obtained among various communions until the present time. There are many today, among our own church members, as well as those of other churches, who firmly believe in it, and conscientiously practice it as the approved method for systematic giving.

Those having these convictions undoubtedly have the right to use it—but there are many others who gravely question whether tithing should be held up as the ideal of Christian giving for the whole church in these times.

Social and Economic Conditions Changed.

When we consider how entirely different social and industrial conditions are today from those in the days of Moses, and for centuries afterward, it hardly seems credible that the same system for giving should be suitable to both ages. The Hebrews were a pastoral and agricultural people; in the period of their health and growth, there was nothing approaching to the inequality in the distribution of wealth that we find today. There was originally a fair division of land among the tribes and families, and the law had various provisions to preserve this ownership intact. When a person, by poverty or misfortune, had to sell his land, he always had the right of redemption on easy terms; if he could not buy it back, his next of kin had that privilege; we have an example of this in the story of Ruth, when Boaz redeemed the land of his kinsmen, Mahlon and Chilion, the sons of Naomi. The year of jubilee was another expedient against extremes of poverty or riches—it provided that every fifty years, the land should revert to its original owners. Whether this ideal of the Mosaic law was of long continued and general use we do not know—it was certainly a noble and generous conception to give liberty to the slave, the land back to its original owner, and a fresh start in life to the unfortunate. With such provisions for a fair partition of land there could be no great inequalities of wealth among the Jews. How stubbornly they clung to their ancestral acres is told in the story of Naboth, who refused to sell his vineyard to the king, either for a better vineyard, or for its worth in money, and lost his life in consequence. The same ratio in giving could be justly imposed on a people among whom there were no great variations in social and industrial life.

A Manifest Injustice.

But to enforce a uniform proportion for giving when there are such tremendous differences in the distribution of wealth as we find today seems a manifest injustice. Is it fair that giving should be expressed in the same terms for the woman toiling in the sweat shop at starvation wages, as for the billionaire, whose wealth is past the reach of human thought? The fact that the tenth of the annual income of the one would be a trifle, and of the other a vast sum is not the essential thing—it goes far deeper than that.

Professor Walter Rauschenbusch, in his epoch-making book, Christianity and the Social Crisis, points this injustice out effectively. He has much to say about the widening gulf between the laboring man and the church, and claims that tithing is one of the contributing causes to this estrangement. He gives a number of carefully compiled tables of the expenditure of incomes, from five hundred dollars to five thousand dollars a year. The man who makes five hundred dollars a year (and this is far more than many a laboring man or woman earns) practically has to spend it all on the absolute essentials of life, food, clothing, shelter,—with little or no provision for vicissitudes like sickness, or lack of employment, and absolutely no resources for recreation, or up-to-date sanitation in his home. The tables of incomes up to five thousand dollars a year, show a larger basis for the primary essentials of life, with an assured provision for the inevitable rainy day, as well as an ever increasing amount to the credit of secondary essentials, like special education for his children, improved sanitation and comfort in his home, and needed recreation for himself and family Disparity of Incomes.

Of course, in the incomes of the very wealthy, there is a large surplus, which represents no need, no pleasure even to its owner. To require a man to give the same proportion of an income that represents a bare subsistence in a grim struggle for existence for himself and his family, that another gives of what represents his pleasures or luxuries, or even of an ever increasing surplus, seems to violate a fundamental principle of justice. The comparative amounts received from the two sources is not the essential thing; Jesus long ago showed when he praised the widow's offering, that the giver rather than the gift is to be considered.

The giving of one tenth of one's annual income, then, is too much for some, and far too little for others. It is too great a tax on many in these latter days, who bear,

"The heavy burden, the bewildering care,
Of those who toil and earn their daily bread."

It is far too small a gift for many others, to whom Jesus might say as he did to the rich young man,

"Go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor."

The Wisdom of Jesus.

How wise is our Lord, that he never stooped to any mere method of work! These matters were but unimportant details, to be evolved and wrought out as time and occasion might demand. The heart of man is the stronghold he attacks—at its door, he stands and knocks, and asks for entrance and lodging. When He abides there, then our giving will be in accordance with the spirit of Him, who was rich, yet for our sakes became poor. Then will it be an easy task to give as we are exhorted to do—with liberality, with cheerfulness, as God hath prospered us.

"Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, that He himself said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." I. W. H.

As the Years Roll On

Advancing years are permitted to shut us in. More people are worrying over the fact that they are growing old than give anxious thought to any other thing. They do not see that age has compensations which no other period of life conveys. Is there not satisfaction in the superior wisdom which comes only with experience? Is there not comfort in reflecting that one is not so foolish as formerly? Think of the broader knowledge of life, of the sense of achievement, which is attained after the battle, but never before it. Think of the richer emotions, the spiritual repose, the longer vision, the points of vantage which are possible only to the aged. Think of the prospect on Pisgah which no one ever gets in the valley. Rabbi Ben Ezra had it:

"Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made.
Our times are in his hand
Who saith, 'A whole I planned,'
Youth shows but half: trust God: see all, nor be afraid!"

Aye, but it is the close of the life that bothers. Getting old would be nothing were it not for that grim thing that marks the finish. But the habit of expectancy will correct the morbid thought of death, which does not shut life in, but takes the cover off that there may be more life. That old pagan, with a fine light in his eyes, Walt Whitman—has he not shamed us with his better view of death than half of Christendom holds?

"Thee, holiest minister of heaven; thee, envoy, usherer, guide at last of all; Rich, florid loosener of the stricture-knot called life; sweet, peaceful, welcome Death."

Is not life like the passing of a voyager adown a river, guarded on either side by mountains? As he moves on, the vistas widen, the hills stand farther apart, the current runs deeper, the brimming flood is smoother and broader, till the sea breaks on the sight—the bundles, allenswathing sea!

The Amazon rolls as far as from California to Maine. It is as wide as its mouth as from Boston to Portland. It pushes its fresh waters two hundred miles into the briny ocean. That is a picture of life projecting itself into the beyond. The hereafter will surely feel the impulse of today

November 24 is the day set for taking Sunday-school offerings for American missions.

Now is the time that those churches which sent their pastors to the Louisville convention are receiving their reward.

"The Servant in the House" was the subject of E. L. Powell's sermon at the October "month-end" service in First Church, Louisville.

While First Church, Pasadena, Cal., is without a pastor, Mr. Frank G. Tyrrell, of Los Angeles, an attorney, but formerly a minister, will supply the pulpit.

The Christian Sunday-school at Logansport, Ind., J. H. Craig, pastor, recently captured a banner for the largest number of adults in a Sunday-school parade.

Disciple missionaries at Manila, P. I., have made a beginning at a hospital with six beds. The beds are all occupied and other patients are seeking entrance. Two Roman Catholic friends and one Presbyterian friend of the missionaries gave the means to start the hospital.

A new church edifice for the mission congregation worshiping at Grand River and Allendale avenues, Detroit, was dedicated Oct. 27 by C. J. Tanner, of Central Church. F. P. Arthur, city evangelist, has been mainly responsible for the building of both the congregation and the meeting house.

A $20,000 addition to the house of worship of Lakewood, O., church, near Cleveland, was dedicated by F. M. Rains last Sunday. The membership of the church is 350 and the usual attendance at Sunday-school is over 400. The pastor, Walter S. Goode, feels that he is in the midst of a great opportunity for developing a strong church.

At this season, each year, numerous organizations have the purchase of a church bell in contemplation. There are no days more appropriate for bell-dedication services than Christmas or watch-night. The C. S. Bell Company, of Hillsboro, Ohio, manufacturers of the well-known steel alloy bells, have a special selling plan which is very favorable for church and school. Those interested should ask for catalog and particulars.

Very Much "Called."

Perry J. Rice, pastor at El Paso, Tex., is coming to be the most "called" man in the Disciples' ministry. Besides a number of invitations on previous occasions he received three in one week recently, all of them to leading churches of the brotherhood. He admits that, coming in a "bunch" that way, he was somewhat disturbed as to his duty, but decided to decline them all and to remain in El Paso where he feels increasing satisfaction in his work. Mr. Rice comes very near being a model minister in pulpit, in pastorate and in personal friendship. Well might he be be coveted by any church. He is just beginning his fourth year at El Paso.

The Late Mrs. Caroline B. Kane.

Committee for Toronto, 1913.

The committee of five appointed at Louisville to initiate procedures for organizing the convention at Toronto in 1913, consisting of J. B. Briney, Peter Ainslie, Carey E. Morgan, M. L. Bates and C. S. Medbury, have appointed eight others to work with them as follows: W. N. Briney, Louisville, Ky.; W. C. Morro, Indianapolis, Ind.; E. B. Bagby, Baltimore, Md.; W. H. Book, Columbus, Ind.; J. H. MacNeill, Winchester, Ky.; P. H. Welshimer, Canton, O.; E. A. Gongwer, Washington, D. C.; R. A. Doan, Nelsonville, O. These persons, together with one representative for each of the national societies and the national state secretaries' association, will constitute the committee on organization of the first "General Convention of Christ."

Passing of a Remarkable Woman.

The death of Mrs. Caroline Kane, late of Springfield, Ill., removes from the church life of that city and of central Illinois, a personality of extraordinary attractiveness and significance. She was bride at the first marriage of white persons in Sangamon county. Her husband was a Disciple preacher of marked power, having held pastorates at Springfield and Jacksonville. For many years Mrs. Kane has lived with her two daughters in Springfield a few steps from the home of her son, Judge Charles P. Kane, an elder in First Church. Mrs. Kane has been the object of tender solicitude on the part of the membership and pastors of First Church for many years. It was a great event when her health permitted her to attend worship. Her extraordinary cheeriness of disposition was scarcely less pronounced than her broad grasp of the large problems both religious and political.

A Man Who Should Be Heard More.

One of the most acceptable "supply" preachers within reach of the churches of eastern Ohio or western Pennsylvania is Prof. E. E. Snoddy, of Hiram College. He filled the Euclid Ave. pulpit during Pastor Goldner's absence in Palestine last summer and will preach for East End Church, Pittsburgh, while Pastor Ewers is holding a series of Decision meetings in First Church, Kansas City. Prof. Snoddy recently contributed an article on "Corporate Christianity" to the Christian Evangelist which, if it were carefully read and inwardly digested, would solve more problems than any article that has appeared in that journal in many a day. We clipped the article intending to reprint it in The Christian Century and comment upon it, but up to the present no opportunity has opened for doing so. Prof. Snoddy is a man with a scholarly and vital message.

Peoria Church Has Many Activities.

Central Church, Peoria, Ill., M. L. Pontius, minister, has a well-equipped office in the church building and a competent paid secretary who is not only the minister's helper but also the general secretary and treasurer of the Sunday-school and secretary of the church. The Sunday-school gave a motion picture entertainment in the church last week. Five hundred people were present. These entertainments will be continued throughout the winter. Each Wednesday evening the Sunday-school officers, teachers and workers meet at the church for a luncheon at 6:30 and Training Institute meeting at 7:15. Prof. F. H. Evans conducts the Institute, using Brumbaugh's "The Making of a Teacher." There are additions to the Sunday-school and church every Sunday. The building is felt to be too small and plans are being considered to enlarge it. The Christian Endeavor is one of the largest societies in Illinois.

Mr. Pontius unselfishly attributes this success "largely to the work done in the office and to the efficient service of H. B. Holloway, our Sunday-school superintendent, also to the most excellent work done by my predecessor, W. F. Turner, and to the Eva Lemert Sunday-school campaign."

An "Efficiency Dinner."

John R. Ewers, minister of East End Church, Pittsburg, has written and talked much about running a church on efficiency lines and at last the official board of his own church became enthusiastic over the subject. They gave a dinner at the Rittenhouse hotel on the evening of Oct. 28, to discuss church efficiency. Three large tables were surrounded by leading business men who who are members of this church. These men came together to seriously discuss managing their church as they did the large business concerns wit which they are connected. There were ten speeches, all of such a high order that they deserve publication. Some of these speeches were written and showed thoughtful preparation. They said that they came together there as a board of bank directors might come or as the managers of a railroad. The spiritual, financial, social and educational resources and obligations of the church were most ably discussed. These men all insisted that the day had come when men of affairs must dedicate their ability and time to the advancement of God's Kingdom.

A fine willingness was expressed to get under the burdens of the church and the reach and amplitude of their planning was, it is said, enough to make the average preacher catch his breath. Railroad, steel and insurance men described how big results were obtained in their respective fields. It was decided to appoint a standing committee on "Church Efficiency" which was to report in a month after a careful study of the plant and resources. A young business man who is achieving remarkable success in his field insisted that at the next meeting each man come in with one definite suggestion and invited the men to meet in his home. Thus the movement is on. East End Church now has the distinction of being the only Front Rank Church in the entire state. There are four hundred members on the revised list. Two hundred have been added in the past three years. The church is not burdened with organizations. It has a Junior Society, an Endeavor Society, a well-organized Sunday-school, a C. W. B. M. and an Aid Society.

The High Calling

electrical dock openers which are spread out on the dining-room table.

"You mean since I left you sitting on that log at Tolchaco?"

"Maybe that is what I mean," Helen says, and she is more agitated than she has for years thought she could be.

"Then you know what 'Loben ist nicht lieben' means now?"

"Yes, I know that and—"

"The world has praised me much since that time, but it is an empty thing. I am a lonesome man, sitting alone with honor. 'Loben ist nicht lieben?' Is it not so?"

The tears are in Helen's eyes. This man will win her yet. Bauer mutters again.

"Was von Herzen kommt, geht zu Herzen," and then forgetting that Helen understands he says as if talking to himself, 'What comes from the heart goes to the heart.' May I come to-morrow or soon and—tell you what is in my heart?"

Helen smiles as she notes the old sign of distrust in himself that used to mark the old young Bauer she used to know. But she says with a new note of life in her own voice: "Yes, come to-morrow."

"There will be much for my heart to tell thine," he says dropping inevitably into the endearing pronoun.

And as he rises and goes away Helen follows his stalwart figure out of the doorway and then goes and sits down by the fire again.

Her mother finds her there.

"Mr. Bauer, Felix, is coming here to-morrow, mother. I know what he is coming to say."

Esther pauses. Helen answers her unspoken question.

"I am going to find my happiness, mother. It is the highest voice I have heard. I am not afraid to answer it."

So with all who have fought and prayed and yearned for the overcoming life in this story, may they all say, "I am not afraid to answer the call when it sounds to me, the sound of 'The High Calling.'"

THE END.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

Wm. G. McColley, of Shelbyville, began a meeting at Alvin, but a diphtheria scare allowed to run only one week.

F. A. Sword is having a great meeting at and J. A. Kay song leader. At last report there were 45 additions. Mr. Sword had 31 additions in the Lovington meeting.

It is too early to predict the results of the "Illinois Day" offering Nov. 3, but there ought to be a very large response. Very few churches in the state gave a double offering in May, and all those that did not should raise a fine offering in November for state missions. he two societies—Home and State—cannot do their work on one offering unless it is a double offering. This ought to be very clear to everybody. Both societies will suffer loss in our co-operative plan if the churches and preachers do not keep this clearly in mind and give the Home-State service an amount equal to two full offerings.

W. H. Schwan, of Danville, O., is settled in his new work at Salem, and we welcome him to our state and fellowship.

George H. Brown, pastor of Austin Church, has at last been persuaded by Taylorville, Ill., Church to accept its pulpit. Mr. Brown was invited some six months ago to the Taylorville pastorate but declined. Later the invitation was repeated and held in abeyance until it was accepted last week. Mr. Brown succeeded George A. Campbell at Austin Church, coming to Chicago from Charleston, Ill., where he had been remarkably successful: He has been in Chicago over one year and has attached to himself many friends in his local community and among Disciple ministers. His church regrets to have him leave. He begins his work at Taylorville December 1.

C. E. Booth, of Pleasanton, Kans., preached at Monroe St. Church last Sunday. The pulpit of this church is still vacant.

The Quarterly Assembly of Chicago Disciples was held Oct. 27 in the First Methodist Church autditorium. A fine audience, filling the main floor, was present. The speakers for the day were Dr. I. N. McCash, secretary, and Homer E. Sala, field agent of the American Missionary Society, together with Prof. Martin Schmidt and Alexander Persianoff, the deputies from Russia who brought greetings to the Louisville convention. The proposal of the American Society to raise a fund of $100,000 for equipment of mission plants among foreigners in New York, Cleveland, Minneapolis and Chicago was the chief topic of discussion. Chicago churches took to the suggestion with enthusiasm. At a luncheon of local leaders in conference with Dr. McCash and Mr. Sala it was decided that the sum to be spent to establish the Russian mission in this city should not be less than $25,000, of which amount it was agreed one-half should be raised in Chicago. Illinois churches will be especially appealed to for the other half.

CHICAGO

Saloon Has No Inherent Right

THE BEST TEMPERANCE news that Chicago has had for years is the recent decision of the supreme court of the state which, if sustained, will compel approximately 3,000 saloons to close with the end of the license year, Oct. 31. The clause relating to the "perpetuation of licenses" is wiped out, which means that licenses will be granted only for one year, and at the end of that period the holder loses all the rights obtained under the license and must take his chances with the others who desire to go into the liquor business. The decision really makes the mayor the court of last resort, and he can say who shall and shall not have licenses. This strikes a deadly blow at the 3,000 brewery-owned saloons. The fear is, however, that action may be taken by the city council which will render the decision nugatory. The following is an excerpt from the decision of the judges: "The business of selling intoxicating liquor is attended with danger to the community and it is a recognized subject for regulation by the police power of the state. There is no inherent right to carry it on and it may be strictly prohibited. The manner and extent of its regulation, if permitted to be carried on at all, is to be determined by the state so as to limit as far as possible the evils arising from it. The power conferred upon the city is co-extensive with that of the state and includes authority to adopt any means to reduce the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquor, reasonably adapted to that end, which do not violate constitutional rights. The legislature cannot confer any power which it does not itself possess and cannot authorize a discrimination between individuals not founded upon a reasonable difference, for it could not itself make such discrimination."

The distribution of the Bible in foreign lands should be accelerated. At last year's rate of progress, it would take 160 years to give every person in China a copy of the scriptures. Among the Christians of the republic, the pocket Testament league is spreading. It is international in scope and advocates carrying a New Testament at all times.

The Call of the Christ

The Chicago Daily News says: "Christ calls men to himself, and through vision, love and possession one grows on to likeness. Jesus is the living expression of God's life in terms of humanity, and he is the supreme manifestation of the normal humanity. His life is the one character most easy to reproduce. Christ's call is to intellect, heart and will, to rouse the best manhood of this age, and for it all the world, says the author, is waiting. This is an illuminating, hope bringing, strengthening work."

The Baptist Commonwealth says: "Only a few men could have written this masterly exposition of the character of Jesus. It is a work of striking power and reality—a vital, living, convincing portrayal. Scholarly, yet simple, philosophical yet understandable, original in phraseology yet lucid, a positive yet persuasive presentation of the claims of Christ. It will strengthen the faith of those in doubt, cheer the sorrowing, give courage to the fearful, bring hope to the despairing—in a word, impart to every reader a satisfactory and realistic vision of the Master."

The Watchman says: "People who have listened to Prof. Willett as a public speaker have been impressed by the clearness, simplicity and logic with which he expresses his ideas. The same characteristics appear in the volume under notice. It is a scholarly, philosophical and understandable presentation of a great theme."

"The spirit of controversy is quite absent and yet it is sufficiently argumentative to indicate the positive convictions of the author."—C. C. Rowlison.

The Church as a Religious Force

IS THE CHURCH LOSING ITS GRIP upon the life of the nation? Look at a few figures. In 1800 only seven persons out of every 100 of the total population in this country were members of the church. In 1850 there were fifteen to every 100; in 1870, seventeen; in 1889, twenty; in 1890, twenty-two; in 1900, twenty-four; in 1910, twenty-four. There seems to be a crisis on just now. The increase in the population in the United States from 1900 to 1910 was 21 per cent. The increase in the church membership from 1900 to 1910 was 21 per cent. What will the next decade show? It is rather unsafe to prophesy. But more and more it is becoming apparent that great movements of reform and reconstruction are seeking a home and center about which they may organize and unify themselves, and there is none other like the Church if the Church will only take them.

There are some people who are insisting that there is today a conflict between religion and the Church, However that may be this much is certain—to quote Bishop Williams of the Protestant Episcopal church:

"The Church cannot re-make religion, it cannot shrink it into the old convenient and conventional type, cannot crowd it back again into the old doctrinal and ecclesiastical forms. Religion made the Church in the first place, and it must re-make it today—re-make it into the natural and hospitable home of all that is best and highest in our modern life and world."

These are strong words, and they come from an eminent authority. They are not by any means pessimistic, but they show the stirring of a strong man's blood in his hope for the realization of a splendid dream of what the Church may become. The Church of Jesus Christ was ordained of God and it will ultimately triumph. It may not in its present form, for the Church has changed outwardly many times since it was first given to us. In essentials it has remained the same, but in organization and in activities it has constantly been modified to meet the demands of the age.

The Church was not created by priests and ministers. So far as the human side is concerned it grew out of the naturally religious instincts of the people. The persistence of religious institutions shows that they are factors of importance in the life of the community. For many the Church is the most powerful of all agents of social control. Its place among social institutions is unique. From this standpoint alone the best interests of society will be better served by strengthening the Church instead of battering it down. As a fact the Church does its best work in the realm of idealism.

Josh Billings once said: "Before you can have an honest horse race you must have an honest human race." There seems to be much horse sense in this expression. Before it is possible to have an ideal social system we must have ideal men. It is the chief business of the Church to develop such men—men with muscle and mind and morals, men who will fight for the right and a square deal. Those who believe in the general proposition that it is better to have strong men than weak, educated men instead of ignorant, good men instead of bad, might well sincerely stand back of the Church in the work that it is trying to do.

Sometimes men say: "I believe in religion but I do not believe in the Church." It is impossible to have real religion without organization. Not necessarily the form or organization we have in the Church today, but some kind of organization must result from religion, for true religion, is a social force. No man can be religious alone. There must be a God and a neighbor. The Church is man's expression of his religious life and instincts. It is the organization which he has formed to permit him to serve best. True religion means service. It is the business of the Church to save not itself but the world, for it is only as the Church is willing to lose its life that it will find it among the masses.

After all it must be confessed that the fundamental cause of distress and injustice is sin, and the Church, as a religious force, is fighting sin; so that when a preacher denounces sin wherever he sees it—the sin of the employer as well as the sin of the employee—he is helping to improve social conditions. The Church has its greatest mission in the spiritual salvation of mankind, and this must be given the greatest emphasis. No other society is today doing more than the Church, even in the matter of social service. Some years ago a well-known preacher in New York, becoming impatient with the Church, rented a large hall and later a theater, and for two years he denounced the Church, seeking relationships with those who he thought were doing more than the Church in the emancipation of the people. At the end of this period he returned with the statement that however the Church may have failed no other agency is doing more to help mankind.

"Doctors of Phaking."

Under the title "Faking as a Fine Art," a newspaper man in the November American Magazine makes some interesting confessions. The question naturally arises whether this article may not be one more fake on the part of a man upon whom the new school of journalism in Columbia University might well confer a new kind of a Ph. D. degree, Doctor of Phaking! Whether or not he has told a "built-up" story, to use his own phrase, is quite unimportant. "Everything" in it is "possibly true." It has, to employ another of his phrases, "convincingosity." Moreover, it confirms the experience of many, especially those in public life, who have had anything to do with the reporters employed by a wellknown section of the public press. In pleasing contrast to these journalistic "Ph. D.'s" are the ideals of the United Press Association. In the same number of the American Magazine a writer describes the rapid rise of Mr. Roy W. Howard, now in his twenty-ninth year, who for six years has been the editorial head of this news agency. The United Press has become an important factor in molding public opinion. Through its impartial reports of the strike of the textile workers at Lawrence, Mass.—and it was the only news agency in the country to give the whole truth about the situation—Senator Poindexter was moved to investigate Lawrence in person, upon which followed congressional interference and the federal probe by Commissioner Chas. P. Neill, of the Department of Commerce and Labor. The sole watchword of the United Press is "get the truth." Its ideal is to get all sides of every question, lay down the facts, and let the people draw their own conclusions. Such ideals as these ought to commend themselves so strongly to Christian men that they would be moved to ask at once whether the papers they read make use of such news agencies and have such ideals as these about news. Editors are more sensitive to public opinion than any other class. If every reader of these words should express his feeling on these matters in writing, with discrimination and moderate statement, to the editor of his daily paper, there would ensue a reformation in many a newspaper office throughout the land. The public that feeds upon fakes is almost as much to blame as the press that furnishes them.

The liquor traffic, through its alcoholic slaves, murders millions throughout the world every year. When it sends forth one of its degenerates to raise his hand against a prominent man, the world shudders. Is it nothing to us when those who are not prominent are murdered by wholesale?

Surgery for the "Sick Man of the East."

The Slav has the Turk on the run. The latest news from the seat of war which comes as The Christian Century goes to press is that the Ottoman forces have retreated to the last line of fortifications outside Constantinople. "It has been," says a war-correspondent, "the most complete military disaster since Mukden, the greatest debacle since Sedan." The Greeks have taken Prevesa without resistance and the Servian army is occupying Prishrend. The taking of Adrianople will without much doubt speedily end the war. The Porte has already appealed to the powers to intervene, but it is generally believed that Bulgaria will refuse to listen to any suggestion of this sort on the part of the powers until the allies are at the gates of Constantinople. This would seem to be the first step in driving the Turk out of Europe, which would have taken place long ago had not the jealousies of the great European powers stood in the way. The Balkan peninsula is the key to the Mediterranean, and that is where Russia wants to get. Austria-Hungary is equally desirous of reaching the Aegean. A dissolution of the Ottoman empire in Europe would not only threaten their interests, but might plunge Europe into a fearful conflict in which all of the great powers including England would become involved. It may be that even at this late date the European nations will have to pay in coinage of blood and ruined cities for the sinful treaty of Berlin in which the selfishness of the powers deliberately turned aside the treaty of San Stefano, which ended the Russo-Turkish war Mar. 3, 1878, and returned Macedonia to Turkish control. What the Balkan allies are now fighting to gain was practically ceded by the Porte at that time, and lost to the Balkan peoples as a result of the diplomatic conference of the powers in Berlin a few weeks later. American Christians, however, have another and deeper interest in the Balkan situation. The result of the conflict upon American missions in the Turkish empire may be most serious. The defeat of the Turk seems almost certain to lead to massacres of Christians by Moslem fanatics. The powers of the triple entente, Great Britain, Russia and France, have already sent a note to Bulgaria, Greece and Servia, pointing out the danger to Christians should they occupy Constantinople and Saloniki.

The Real Purpose of Thanksgiving

Thanksgiving brings us to a consideration of the sources of our success and happiness. Exhortations to be grateful have meaning when we recognize that we have received benefits. If we attribute our good fortune to our own labor and wisdom, we shall have pride and self-complacency instead of gratitude. Not unto God, but unto ourselves will praise arise for deliverance from disease and want and sorrow.

It is better to refrain from expressions of thankfulness than to feign a sentiment we do not possess. Insincerity is the death of morals and religion. Is it enough, then, to say, in answer to the proclamations of the President of the United States and the governors of the states, that we have no lively sense of obligation to anybody for the blessings we enjoy and that we shall disregard the call to the people to assemble in their places of worship and give thanks to God for his mercies? It is possible that it is ignorance and not wisdom that explains our lack of grateful feelings. It may be to our advantage to meditate upon the means by which we have come to be what we are and have acquired the good things which we call our own.

The sense of dependence is so essential a part of religion that some have made it the whole of religion. "The earth is Jehovah's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein." We found the world here when we came; we did not create it. We found human society, laws, customs, language, art, literature, science, philosophy, and religion. These have made us what we are. Are they not the gift of God. Shall we see God in the unusual occurrences and not in the growth of the arts and sciences and in the increase of justice and good will on earth? Shall we see him in the conversion of the outcast and not in the life of one who has been kept from the sins that separate him from his fellows?

We use Thanksgiving for the purpose of adding to our appreciation of natural beauty. "I am a lover of knowledge," said Socrates, "and the men who dwell in the city are my teachers, and not the trees or the country." We admire Socrates for his love of human society and his delight in learning from men and in teaching them, but he was none the better for his aversion to the country. The trees and the animals are not bad companions. By associating with them we gain elements of culture the city cannot give. If we know trees and animals, we know much of ourselves and the ways of God. The God of nature is a great God, and our knowledge of nature increases our reverence for Him.

It is customary on Thanksgiving, in many churches, to take an offering for the benefit of the poor. This is without doubt a good custom. A better custom is that of those who always give personal attention to strangers, the bereaved, the lonely, the discouraged, and the needy. Organized charity is a mark of advanced civilization, but we cannot commit to it all tender ministeries to the unfortunate. The poor do not live by bread alone. They need friends to whom they can open their hearts and from whom they can receive sympathy. The boys and girls need friends who understand them more than they need sermons and lectures. If they have friends whose first aim is to be friends, they will be able to understand the teaching of the school and the church.

The church should interpret life for us. It does this service through the word of its minister and through the symbolism of its worship. We can show our gratitude by making a contribution to the efficiency of the church. We can treat the minister as a man worthy of confidence and thus point young men to the minister. We can demand the best qualities of brain and heart in those who come forward to interpret human experience. The schools that train ministers need help. Their defects should be seen by the friends of the church and of its ministers before the enemies of religion have an opportunity to ridicule the programs and the achievements of Bible colleges and theological seminaries. Friends see defects and seek remedies. Gratitude for the services of the church to us may well take the form of wise counsel and material aid to the institutions that furnish leaders of the church. We can further strengthen the church by giving attention to its worship. Is it using outgrown symbols? Let us discard them. Do our lips pray without insincerity? It is our privilege to assist in getting better songs and in improving the language and thought of the prayers uttered in public worship. [Midweek Service, Nov. 20. Ps. 33:107:111.] S. J.

Among the Bay Churches

(Editorial Correspondence.)

It is no secret among those who are aware of conditions in American cities that San Francisco is not an easy place in which to do church work. The reasons for this state of affairs need not be discussed here. It is not that the citizens are godless or irreverent more than those of other large communities. In fact there have been records of more successful church work here. Dr. Charles R. Brown had for years in Oakland, just across the Bay, one of the largest and most effective churches in the country, and Dr. C. F. Aked left one of the richest congregations in New York because he believed he could do more successful work in San Francisco.

None the less the difficulty of religious ministries here is keenly felt by all who have made the effort. And if our own churches have shared this condition to some extent it should surprise no one. Like others we have suffered in many ways. Ministerial adventurers have in times past made capital of the remoteness of the coast from the center of the brotherhood, where they would be better known and less likely to work evil. This day has now largely ended, but the unhappy results of earlier visitations of this sort are not yet wholly removed. Then too the material opportunities offered by the rich soil and pregnant hills have made it easy for men to forget their former religious interest in the abundance of other things.

So many churches of the coast run the gamut of the early apostolic churches, from Smyrna, militant and watchful, to Laodicea, lukewarm and faithless. Some of them have had notable records in the past but are losing out. Some are putting forth the signs of a fresh and bounding life. And some are holding the even course of quiet and plodding steps without much progress, but without relapse.

F. W. Emerson ministers to First Church in San Francisco. There is an excellent property in its possession, but many things have conspired to make the work difficult. There are perhaps a hundred and fifty members. Mr. Emerson is an effective preacher, and active in every work of social reform, as he has ever been. Such a leader is sure to bring the most out of the situation if his people trust him and support his efforts. But his task is not easy.

The pastorate of T. A. Boyer at First Church in Oakland extends back over many years, and is the most successful of any in the recent history of our cause in the Bay cities. A handsome new church property is now well on toward completion, and is already occupied in part. The relations of the Baptists and Disciples in Oakland have been cordial and intimate at times, and they ought to be more so. Where both denominations have a difficult problem to face, as in such cities, strength might be found in union.

First Church in Berkeley has recently passed through an eventful phase in its history. Under the leadership of H. J. Loken, it was led to consider the question of its attitude toward the other evangelical churches of the vicinity. Mr. Loken was persuaded that the refusal of the Disciples to receive members from pedo-

Baptist churches except upon their rebaptism did not reflect the spirit of Jesus, and was not even true to the purposes of the fathers of this movement. After due consideration, the church decided to receive such upon their letters from neighboring churches, while continuing, in harmony with the practice of the Disciples, the reception of members upon confession of faith by immersion alone.

Of course, while unusual among the Disciples, such a practice is not new or without excellent precedent. A growing number of our churches and of the Baptists receive members of non-immersionist churches into some form of relationship, partial or complete. The vote upon the question in the Berkeley church was carried by a very large majority. Those members who dissented from the prevailing opinion have remained in fellowship with the church, though not all of them in attendance. Very wisely they declined to precipitate a division of the church, or appeal to the courts to thwart the will of the majority, though, astonishingly enough, they were advised to take such unwarranted and un-Christian action by the representative of one of our journals, who would thus have counselled the nullification of every principle of democracy and church freedom for which the Disciples have contended for more than a century.

The Berkeley church has passed through a period of testing and self examination as a result of its decision. That step has evoked many different judgments from the brethren on the Coast. Some have condemned the action as contrary to the convictions and practices of the Disciples. Some have openly approved it as prophetic of an increasing tendency toward brotherhood and freedom. Some have withheld open comment while at heart convinced of the courage and rightness of the step taken. But nearly all, no matter what their personal attitude may have been in the case, have conceded that the congregation, acting in the capacity of a democratic and self-governing body, like all the congregations of the Disciples, was entirely within the circle of its rights, and took no step which can sunder it in any manner from the fellowship of the Disciples.

There are many matters of policy and conduct on which an individual church of the free congregational type has entire liberty of self expression. The modification of a custom long followed by our churches, even one so common as the refusal to recognize by formal action the Christian character and standing of the non-immersed members of other churches, lies within the domain of such congregational liberty, and the resolution of the Berkeley church to employ that liberty in taking its recent action lies quite beyond the limits of any outside espionage or ecclesiastical surveillance.

As to the wisdom of the step, time alone can determine. The outcome will be watched with interest by all. At the present the church is alert, active and happy. With the exception of the minority which opposed the new effort to practice Christian unity, the church is perfectly united in spirit and action. Its devotion to Mr. Loken and his work is delightful. If this condition abides, and the additions by confession and baptism continue at their present rate, the future is bright. The Berkeley church will do well to devote itself with whole-souled consecration to its own field and to the effort to make good in all the ministries of a church of Christ. The effectiveness of its testimony regarding the reception of members or any other conviction it holds will not lie in any efforts at the propagation of its policy, but in the ardor and efficiency with which it undertakes its work as a church. Nothing will be so convincing regarding the wisdom or otherwise of the step it has taken as its fruitfulness or failure in the service it renders the community and the world.

It will be watched with keen interest, both by those who approve and those who disapprove its action, and the verdict can only be reached in the years to come. Meantime the tolerance and impartiality with which the other churches of the state and the brotherhood deal with the Berkeley church, even where they regard it as having seriously departed from the traditions of the Disciples, will be the measure of their large-hearted and sympathetic interest in the life of a sister congregation, and their faith that the truth of the gospel is certain to win in the end.

South Berkeley church was organized by E. W. Darst during his administration as superintendent of missions in the Bay cities. The present minister is Robert Lord Cave, formerly with the West Side Church in San Francisco, which is now without a pastor. The South Berkeley church has been assisted in its building plans by the Church Extension Board, and has about one hundred and fifty members. Some of those who did not favor the action taken by the First Church in Berkeley, worship with the South Church, and might well remove their membership there.

Of the Alameda Church, Frank Ford, also formerly in San Francisco, is pastor. This church has an attractive building, erected dur- the pastorate of P. C. Macfarlane. The Woodland Church, a strong and effective congregation, is ministered to by Prof. Guy.

One of the substantial churches of the region is that at Fresno, where Dr. H. O. Breeden ministers. After a long and successful career as pastor of the largest congregation among the Disciples, the Central Church in Des Moines, Dr. Breeden devoted himself for several years to an admirable campaign of evangelism. This brought him, among other places, to the Pacific Coast, and led to an acquaintance with the Fresno Church in a series of evangelistic services which issued later in his acceptance of the pastorate for a time. His undiminished effectiveness as preacher and leader have been of great advantage to the church, which is now enjoying a period of substantial growth. Dr. Breeden is recognized as easily the commanding figure on the Coast in the ministry of the Disciples, and his wisdom, sanity, courage and devotion would give him an authoritative position in any campaign which he wished to lead. His long experience in educational work will make him a wise constructive leader in the new enterprises in behalf of Christian education now being set under way near the Golden Gate.

W. P. Bentley is the superintendent of mission work among the Chinese in California, under the direction of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Mr. Bentley has had that best of all preparations for work in such a cause—a considerable term of experience as a missionary on the foreign field. His years in China have made him competent to deal with the many perplexing questions which arise in connection with the evangelization of a foreign population on American soil. He brings to his task the consecration of a missionary and the training of an expert; and may well be trusted to work out his problem in the most effective way.

Notable Wedding on Mission Field

That missionaries are neither saints nor freaks was a dual popular misconception which Mr. A. E. Cory vigorously punctured in one of those good-humored paragraphs which relieved the intensity of his missionary addresses at Louisville. And now as if to corroborate his frank and emphatic admission that missionaries are just plain human folks comes the announcement that two of those belonging to the circle of Disciples in China are to be married. That is quite a fundamental human thing for them to do. The announcement comes in the handwriting of the groom with the accompanying pictures mounted cleverly on the note paper. This is what the note says:

"Just to inform you that on the twelfth day of November, nineteen hundred and twelve, in the city of Nanking, there will be a quiet wedding of two missionaries, Eva May Raw, of Nanking, and George Burleigh Baird, of Lu Chow fu."

Upon their united lives their friends and brethren in the churches pray God's blessing, a prayer in which The Christian Century devoutly joins.

Dr. Chilton's Presidential Address

Lacking, hitherto, a general organization representative of all the interests of the churches, whose president might in an annual address interpret the signs of the times and sound a strong, clear note of leadership, Disciples' conventions have formed the habit of looking to the president of the American Christian Missionary Society for such a service. Almost without exception this service has been rendered from year to year in a large minded and truly helpful fashion.

This year the presidency of the American Society was held by Rev. C. M. Chilton, pastor of First Church, St. Joseph, Mo. The profound impression made upon the convention by his official address has already been referred to in these pages, but the character of the address calls for a more deliberate estimate than was possible while the editorial impulses were kindled by the glow of his burning words. Yet the three weeks that have elapsed have not sufficed to diminish the emotion which the address evoked. We have studied it carefully since, and in preparation for writing this article have re-read the last third of it, and without qualification we are ready to say that this is the most statesmanlike, the most profoundly religious, the most prophetic, and in the present situation, the most significant word that has been uttered in the history of the Disciples' conventions.

It has been our practice for many years to read the official addresses of the moderators of Presbyterian Assemblies like Henry van Dyke and Robert F Coyle, of the moderators of Congregational Councils like Nehemiah Boynton and Thomas MacMillan, of the presiding bishops at the Methodist Quadrennials like Vincent and Oldham, of the presiding bishops at the Episcopal General Conventions like Brent and Lawrence, and we make bold humbly to call the attention of their communions to the fact that the Disciples of Christ have in this address of Dr. Chilton spoken a message which in method, in content and in temper is not excelled in the entire interdenominational repertory of such utterances.

Superlatives are easy and pardonable when they spring from emotion generated in the heat of the event. But the above estimate is not easy; it does not spring from emotion, but from inhibited emotion. And The Christian Century makes no plea for indulgent pardon, but submits its judgment to the most rigid tests of analysis and comparison.

The occasion was a great one. Probably 6,000 people, the pick of the church's intelligence, eager, perturbed and expectant, were gathered in the Louisville Armory. The words of presentation described Dr. Chilton as "a still, strong man in a blatant land." He spoke in a voice whose first words were not clearly audible, like the sound of the distant sea. Some cried "louder," but the voice held its even way and the house compelled itself to become still, subnormally still, so that it should lose not a word. Many listeners were reminded of Rev. George A Campbell's remark in The Christian Century some time since to the effect that Dr. Chilton's voice seems to be "laden with the eternal."

He produced in his hearers from the start the sense that we were dealing with mighty issues. He called from the deep in himself, and his hearers responded from the deep in their own souls. There was not one trifling allusion. There was not a moment's loosening of the vise's grip upon the conscience of his audience. There was not a suggestion of a trick in manner or rhetoric. Not once did he thrust at the emotions for the mere sake of stirring them up. There was not a single falsetto note in his argument, flung in to win applause or to reassure the prejudiced, but his thought moved firm-footed all the way upon the register of reality.

If one might be allowed to put into a picture the impression the address made upon the emotions, quite apart from the thought processes it stirred up, one would call up the image of a light-house built at the place in the sea where diverse currents meet, whose mighty light not only protects the ship from danger but helps it forward on its way.

Dr. Chilton stood in the maelstrom of conflicting currents. He was aware of the currents. He was aware of their forward tendency, of their resistlessness, of their divine guidance, and therefore of their beneficence. His address throbbed with the dynamic of progress; it assumed progress; it neither feared nor fought progress, but welcomed it. The problems that the Church faces today, he said, are problems incident to progress. It is progress that makes the problems.

At the very outset Dr. Chilton laid the foundation of his light-house at the place where the currents of progress meet. Our problems are of three classes, he said:

Those emerging from the growing unity of the Church,
Those emerging from the growing life of the world,
And those emerging from the Disciples' own growth.

This classification of our problems in terms of growth, of forward movement, imparted an urgency to the very logic of his argument which, re-enforced by the urgent temper of the man himself, accounts for the impression of power with which his address was received.

As we pointed out last week, Mr. McLellan's great convention sermon classified our problems statically:

Those to be solved by authority,
Those to be solved by wisdom,
And those to be solved by Christian culture.

Such a classification is not only legitimate but helpful. It implies no reflection upon Mr. McLellan's sermon when we say that Dr. Chilton's address classified our problems dynamically. Mr. McLellan's point of view was that of the artist. Dr. Chilton's point of view was that of the prophet.

And like a prophet he stood in the midst of the problems and told what he saw. He was not making a speech; he was proclaiming the truth. He was not harking back to a static standard; he was striving to make clear the outlines of a living, growing standard. He betrayed no consciousness of parties in the Church—conservative and liberal, or any other parties—between which he must warily steer his way, conciliating with a sop the party whom the main course of his remarks was most likely to offend. He muttered no shibboleths. He vociferated no traditional slogan. He apologized for no "liberal" utterance, and contradicted no "conservative" statement. He chose rather to persuade all parties by standing four square and bearing a man's testimony to the truth as he saw it.

On the question of unifying the Disciples' missionary and benevolent agencies, a question which the very next day was to decide, Dr. Chilton spoke a strong, positive word. "We have no opportunity for a self-conscious group life," he declared. "The churches are hardly able to conceive of themselves as having anything in common So we are at the parting of the way; either we shall undertake a self-conscious development in the direction of democracy with a view to the general leavening of the group and a serious attempt at the kingdom, or we shall fall into primitiveness as a permanent state, leaving all of our affairs to the circumstances of the local church."

On the question of the growing life of the world, Dr. Chilton spoke in the ringing tones of an optimist. Civilization is advancing, he affirmed. "In this transition period there is a wonderful stimulation of the mind; life is more complex and tense, and powerful to discover truth or untruth. The idea of development is reconstructing the whole world of thought. A new view of the world is here, a new atmosphere, a new life of the mind." What shall be our attitude toward this new world? "Shall we who have come to propose a larger interpretation of our religion fall into quarreling with our times?" Allowing for the many follies strewn along the way of scholarship, "still," inquired Dr. Chilton, "may we not trust the scholarship of the West? Are they not seekers after the truth? By what other way shall men come into the knowledge of the truth? If the Church is to maintain its leadership, it must have sympathy with the intellectual struggles of men. We shall not be able to bluster them into submission. There is a gentle, reverent spirit, which is at once the spirit of religion and true scholarship; it is careful of the sacred treasures, and cautious, and conservative, but open-minded and honest, and infinitely kind. The Church that would dominate the future must have large sympathy; it must make room for many types of mind. In a transition period like this, it will not be possible to bring all of those who belong to Christ under the power of any narrow creed."

For the first time in a Disciples' general convention a clear and unequivocal pronouncement was made as to the status of the churches of other communions. "What more can be said of any church than that it is growing up into Christ? Let us then prefer charity and regard all these churches as churches of Christ, all imperfect, some more imperfect than others, but perhaps none entirely fallen from the way." "A friendly acquaintance with those of other communions will greatly modify our prejudices and conceits," continued Dr. Chilton. "And shall we refuse to others that way by which we ourselves have come? Did we not spring from the loins of denominationalism? How else shall the Kingdom come than by some such development as we see lying before us in the life of the Church today? Are they not all seekers after God, at the worst only belated travelers by the way?" Even the Church of Rome in the fifteenth century is accorded a status as "perhaps the Church of God." "There is a larger faith which sees Christ at work in all communions patiently bringing his sheep into one fold," he concludes, and quotes Thomas Campbell to bear out his position.

One would expect that a brave, broad-visioned address like this would deal squarely with the urgent demand now being made that the Disciples practice Christian unity with other Christians. And Dr. Chilton did not disappoint this expectation. "As we become more intimately associated with our brethren of other fellowships in co-operative activities," he said, and, lest he had not been clearly heard, read the sentence a second time, "it will be increasingly difficult for us to require those of mature Christian characters, who may excel us in many things, to submit to the form of immersion at our hands." "Some among us," he continued, "will be less under the power of the letter than others, and will favor readjustments, in the hope of hastening the cause. Even now we have some who are advocating a modification of the terms of fellowship, and a few of the churches have made departures in that direction. The question is the subject of more or less discussion."

"The Disciples will be very slow," said Dr. Chilton. "to depart from a long, well-established practice, which seems so clearly to be based upon the command of Christ, and on apostolic precedent; the more as they consider the unrest and division that will follow."

But whether the Disciples will be slow or rapid in changing their present exclusive practice, the heartening fact is that a leader like Dr. Chilton clearly sees the problem, frankly speaks to it in this representative address and, without the slightest apology, takes a firm forward step toward its solution. He does not go far toward its solution, but he goes in the right direction.

The sectarian effrontery of refusing to receive into the fellowship of "our" churches those whom Christ has received into the full fellowship of his Church unless, forsooth, they "submit to the form of immersion at our hands" is clearly aparent to Dr. Chilton. If Disciples once possessed this insight we have more faith in the rapidity with which they would change their present practice than Dr. Chilton seems to have.

As the people arose to go, having waited until after 1:00 o'clock, caught and held by the majestic sweep of this luminous and urgent utterance, their hearts burned within them.

—Fred B. Smith, in summing up the results of the Men and Religion Movement, in a speech at Montclair, N. J., reveals some remarkable facts.. But of chief interest is his three-fold conclusion on current church problems, which are as follows:

"1. You can hold in your church all the men to whom you can give work that seems to them essential to the life of the church, and you cannot hold any more.

"2. The church must accentuate the new definition of sin which 'Men and Religion' has given it. I was enormously humiliated in a certain city where I heard an itinerant evangelist denouncing theater going, card playing and dancing as the worst evils in the church. An old man on the front seat punctuated the whole address with fervent 'Amens,' and shouted approval for every one of the preacher's denunciations. Yet next day I learned from the lawyer who had formerly taken care of this old church member's business that the man's entire wealth had been built up by outrageous methods of grinding the poor—methods so bad that the lawyer finally quit the old rascal altogether and refused to have anything more to do with his business. The church must not content itself with talking to superficial things, but must get down under the surface where sin takes root in selfishness and cruelty.

"3. In any community where there are two or more Protestant churches there must be developed some kind of means for unified action of Protestantism on its common problem."

—On Tuesday of last week the United States passed through a political revolution. In South American republics such a revolution would have aroused the people to a state of frenzy that would have sent soldiers marching and bullets whistling through the palmettoes. In more than one European city while a battle of ballots was being fought, long rows of bayonets would be gleaming. But here, although there was the most complicated ante-election political situation the country ever knew, our small standing army was sitting in its tents. Although partisan feeling more than once was at fever heat and bitter denunciation led to an attempt to assassinate one of the candidates, notwithstanding all this turmoil, and the possibility that the policies of this or that candidate might result in changes in well-established business arrangements, in this great republic of ours more than 15,000,000 voters cast their ballots for candidates whose proposed policies were each at war with the others, and yet the dove of peace showed not a ruffled feather. In some respects the campaign was the most notable in our national history. There was a question whether or not the election might not be thrown into the house of representatives for final decision, even before the lamented death of Vice-president Sherman. The republic has withstood the stress of four foreign wars and the awful strain of the rebellion of the states; it is now standing firm amid the shock of partisan armies. When a nation can come forth from such a fight with its ranks unbroken, its caissons full of ammunition and its commissary wagons bursting, while all contestants are waving flags, we all may be thankful that the late "spell-binders" of the defeated parties were false prophets.

—"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." All honor to the young fellow of Gary, Ind., who gave his life to save the life of a girl whom he never saw. "Billie" Rugh was a newsboy, crippled and deformed in body, but with a heart warmed with a love which has touched the world and left him among the immortals. Despite his withered leg, "Billie" won many friends in Gary by his unfailing cheerfulness and kindness. Many people went out of their way to buy papers of the little cripple at his corner newsstand. Throughout the city he was known as "Billie." One day the lad read of a girl who had been seriously burned and would never recover unless skin could be grafted upon her wounds. Without a moment's hesitation he offered to give the skin from his limb, though it meant amputation of the leg, and he would use two crutches for the rest of his life. His offer was finally accepted and the life of the girl saved. But "Billie" contracted pneumonia in the hospital, and, smiling still, slipped quietly out of this world. Ten thousand people are said to have gathered to pay a last tribute to the hero. But numbers cannot measure the gratitude of the world to such as he. His love bound a mighty host to him. His part in life seemed insignificant, yet he did with might and with heart that little and was ready to set his crown in glory with that priceless sacrifice. "Billie" is still, and another sells papers where the click of his crutch on the pavement was so familiar. But the memory of his love will live on. Thousands who never knew of him until they learned of his deed, are uniting in erecting a memorial to his memory.

Some Convention Beatitudes

For Baptists—and Others.

Blessed are the moderators who run the program on schedule, for they shall see but few delegates going out before the close of the session.

Blessed are the speakers who do not take time from those who follow, for theirs is the obedience of the eighth commandment.

Blessed are the delegates who attend the devotional meetings, for theirs is the power of the spirit.

Blessed are those who muffle their voices in the lobby, for theirs is the last part of Eccles. 3:7.

Blessed are those who stick to the theme assigned them, for they shall have other opportunities to conduct intellectual Cook's tours.

Blessed are the presiding officers who cut out long anthems and spectacular solos, for they shall hear the angelic choirs of heaven.

Blessed are the committees that manifold their reports, for they shall receive greater publicity.

Blessed are the delegates who leave a sweet taste in the homes where they have received hospitality, for they shall be invited to come again.—The Standard.

The Church in the Country

By W. R. Walker

EDITORS' NOTE: Two addresses at the Louisville convention which commanded most eager attention were the discussion of Country and City churches by Rev. W. H. Walker, pastor of the rural congregation at Killbuck, O., and Rev. R. H. Miller, pastor of Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y. In epigrammatic brilliance both addresses would approach what musicians would call a "staccato" character. But the real secret of the effectiveness of the speeches lay not in the composition nor the trip hammer style of delivery, but in the keen insight into the concrete situation of his field which each speaker displayed. Our readers will be glad to have the two addresses in juxtaposition. They are not contradictory, but supplementary. The one heightens and greatens the other. On the program an equally strong address was delivered between these two by Rev. E. F. Daugherty, of Vincennes, Ind., on the problem of organizing the churches of a given county into an organic unity. That address we will print next week.

The church in the country is God's agency in rural redemption.

The Gospel remains his power unto salvation and the church is analogous to his power plant. The country needs redemption. It may not have the vicious sin of the slum nor the gilded sin of the boulevard; but Satan has not neglected to sow his tares in this field. God has "made of one every nation of men to dwell on the face of the earth;" and the passion and weakness of the one are the heritage of urban and rural dweller alike.

A Vital Factor.

That the church in the country is a vital factor in the community life, all admit. Concretely studied, facts are discovered which both dishearten and encourage. Rural churches dead, dying, shorn of their influence through incompetent leadership or misplaced emphasis on trivialities, or weakened by the city-ward tides of migration, make a composite picture fit to be framed in black. Here is a condition challenging the heroism of both ministry and membership. While the favored churches are being thrilled into ecstasy by the transfigurations wrought on their Hermons of vantage, those forsaken in the valley, because of semi-discipled inefficiency, are vainly struggling with humanity's need. Brethren, my sympathies are with these nine.

A Radiating Center for Righteousness.

Over against these, framed in glory, might be placed another picture, that of rural churches active, efficiently officered, burning with zeal for souls, full of missionary spirit, directing the social and intellectual life, indirectly reacting powerfully on political conditions—in short, being both a rallying and radiating center for everything making for righteousness.

To enhearten for solving the problem presented in the first picture, I dwell mainly on the possibilities portrayed in the second.

The problem of the country church is twofold—that of arranging proper co-operation among the churches, and of securing efficient leadership. Both phases are important, but the first is solved in the second. Here, as everywhere, methods are subordinate to men. In most instances a strong village church should be the center of the co-operation. Grouped with it should be as many other churches as necessary to adequately support the preacher. Extreme congregationalism, where each church arranges for its preaching regardless of the needs of its neighbors, is unwise, extravagant, unChristian. Each congregation, while retaining its local independence and responsibility, should yet subordinate itself to the group need.

Strong Must Help Weak.

This would necessitate strong churches helping to bear the burdens of the weak, but for churches as for individuals, "it is more blessed to give." A strong church should consider it a privilege to bear more than its ratio of expense for ministerial support. The "equality" urged by Paul is based on ability, and should be proportionate thereto. Such an arrangement is both scriptural and necessary. To perfect the plan will require time and a patience like love that "suffers long and is kind."

Radical and transforming changes have been wrought in rural life within the past few years. Scientific agricultural methods are becoming general. The average farmer talks intelligently about proteids, carbohydrates, nitrogen, phosphorous, potassium, etc. The mail delivered daily keeps him informed on the markets and the world's progress. His telephone saves time and horse, extends his social circle and enlarges his community interest. High school advantages are within easy reach.

Provincialism Has Fled Country.

Because of these enlightening conditions, provincialism has fled the rural life, and if existent anywhere, hides in the city. In our country the farmer is not "the man with the hoe," but the prophet of the national life. He is coming into his own. He is still more numerous than any other class, and is unquestionably the nation's best asset. A little observation and experience have led me to believe that the highest average of civic, intellectual and religious wisdom is in the village.

Today is the day of opportunity for the country church. It needs for its ministry men of vision, talent, consecration, broad culture, qualities of leadership, and a versatility not requisite everywhere. The pulpit of the country church needs the country prophet. He must speak for God and represent every force and enterprise that make for righteousness. He must lift up his voice against the prevailing country sins—narrowness, pettiness, gossip, penuriousness.

Salvation a World Need.

The salvation of the church is a vision of world-need and a sense of world-responsibility. Today, as always, the prophet must give the vision, remembering that "where no vision is, the people perish." There is some isolation in rural life which the preacher must share. The seclusion of former times deprived of educational and cultural advantages, and developed provincialism. But that type of isolation has forever made its black-winged flight. The average village today touches elbows with all the world. Telephones, daily papers, magazines, books, farmer's institutes, agricultural extension schools, modern machinery, better roads, bring information and the luxuries of life to the rural home.

Inviting Field for Social Service.

Isolation in the best sense—freedom from some social conventionalities and restraints; the privilege of retiring from the crowd for study and conversation; with a little leisure, introspection and prayer—provides an opportunity for inward growth and development that should appeal to both ministry and membership of the rural church.

The country furnishes an inviting field for social service. Churches have too often been like the rich young ruler—strong on theology and personal morality, but weak in social ministry. Here, philanthropy may be practiced with but little money. There are many neglected localities where the church can be a good Samaritan. Old churches can be revived, Sunday-schools maintained in school houses which will prove valuable feeders for the church.

There are many over-churched sections also. Brethren, who knows but that we have come to the kingdom for such a time as this? Now is our opportunity. Necessity is driving the people toward unity. God is using the hard but effectual law of starvation to eliminate the sectarianism responsible for over-churching these localities. We have been providentially prepared for this emergency, having the scriptural formula for relieving the distressing situation. True, the prescription will not be taken universally, but for that we are not responsible.

Furnishes World its Leadership.

Tomorrow, as today and yesterday, the country will be furnishing the world its leadership. The cities have 5 per cent of our population, but the country provides 8 per cent of the preachers, teachers, doctors, lawyers, legislators, managers of business, and much of the strength of city churches.

The country being the nursery of leadership, the conclusion is plain and irresistible: The country must have the best leadership obtainable. She has before her a task in furnishing ideals to the future brain and brawn of the nation—beside which our national conservation enterprises sink into insignificance. Here is the place to do work for the future.

The fountains of highest moral and religious attainment have seldom been in populous centers. The country or village, is the normal place for propagating manhood at its best. The city needs the product of true manhood, but is content to consume it making little or ineffectual effort to conserve it.

New Blood Sought in Country.

New blood is sought in the country as dependently as the manufacturer turns to forest, field, or mine. Young people on reaching the city must run the gauntlet between vitiating pleasure and commercial dissipation. Those unprotected by the armor of the church cannot hope to escape unhurt. They must be saved for Christ before they reach the city. Hence, the avenue of approach to city salvation is through a country lane. The city is the invention of Cain, and when an angelic census report shows less than ten country people there, conservative real estate investments should be made in remote suburbs.

Not a Practicing Ground.

The country is no practicing ground for a preacher with city ambitions. More than one rural failure has been due to ministerial pride wishing for a "larger field." The congregation was soon echoing the wish. In only one spirit should a preacher take up country work. Having emptied himself as nearly as possible of all selfishness, prayerfully follow divine leading. If led to the rural field, he should enter it with joy, content to make it his life work. In future, let the dechepit toothless advice for young men to go to the country and work for promotion, be withheld. There can be no promotion from a good country field till heaven is entered.

Whoever goes into the country with a patronizing air will leave with bitter memories. He should. The man feeling himself too large for any place to which God calls him has had no call to preach. The God-given vision of the pulpit is not a throne on the mount of ambition, but a beckoning basin and towel at the feet of fellow-servants. There is certain failure for the preacher who for any reason is dissatisfied with his field. When the Master said, "The field is the world," he voiced a profound philosophy.

Both Extensive and Intensive.

It is both an extensive and intensive truth. Every man's field is his world. In it he must live and move and have his being. Whatever of good he will ever do must be done in that field. If in desire he is living elsewhere, his personality is felt nowhere. The preacher fretting or complaining at the work God has given him is unworthy.

Country people are tolerant of the preacher in minor things, exacting in major ones. They expect him to be mindful of the dignity and conduct becoming a preacher. They demand of him honesty, industry, courtesy, sociability, and a genuine interest in people. They prefer a man in the pulpit who reminds them of John Baptist, John Boanerges, or Paul, to one whose personality suggests Edwin Booth, Dickey Pierce, or Aunt Nancy.

True to Bible and the Master.

They want him true to the Bible and the program of the Bible's Master. Saint and sinner alike must be the object of his solicitation, prayer, ministration. The preacher rendering himself indispensable by his services will be reasonably certain of adequate support.

Banish the illusion that the field is small. It is really great. Great in its opportunities for both preacher and church. The true minister is an honored man in the country. The spirit of commercialism which builds the city looks with either pity or contempt on the man who has crucified worldly ambition. It cannot understand him.

Service Outside and Inside Pulpit.

But in the village the preacher is not engulfed in the vastness of a commercial and social environment. His personality, ability and general culture can be serviceable outside as well as inside the pulpit. He can be a factor in its political life; not as a partisan, but as a patriot. The social and intellectual life of the community largely turn to him for suggestion and guidance. How important the place he can fill in the lives of the young—aiding in securing employment, directing in choice of a life work, implanting noble ideals, encouraging and stimulating to great undertakings.

Touches Many People.

The number of people whom the rural preacher touches is not inconsiderable. By preaching at two or more places, his combined audiences may be counted in hundreds. Opportunities to deliver special sermons and addresses, conduct funerals, etc., extend the radius of his parish. The intimacy of social intercourse furnishes leverage for his influence. The village and contiguous territory is a field white unto the harvest for the evangelist. The people go to church. The less strenuous life gives leisure for religious thought and activity, a condition favorable to conversion. There is this consolation also in country evangelism: methods above criticism may be successfully employed.

The solidarity of the country community brings the church a coveted opportunity for leadership. The country is a community. There is mutuality of industrial interest. Social, educational, political life have much in common. This close relationship in general suggests the unity that should obtain in the religious objective.

Long Pastorate Desirable.

A long pastorate is desirable in the country. The church can mark out a campaign requiring years for realization. The preacher can identify himself with the community in religious, educational and social life. He may have investments in its industrial interests and handle them in such a way as to inure to the benefit of both himself and the church. The pecuniary advantage of a long pastorate requires but passing mention. A fixed home will give his family a feeling of responsibility toward the community—a feeling essential to good citizenship.

It is good for the preacher himself. To continue leadership of the people, he must grow. He will ever be under the necessity of surpassing himself—no easy task. He speaks to people hospitable to the ancient Gospel, but who are chilled by sermons fresh from refrigeration; and whose keen olfactories resent barrel mustiness.

I have stressed the preacher, because he is the key to the situation.

A Plea for Country Church.

I close with a plea for the country church. In so doing, I lean heavily on one motive—duty. There can be no higher motive than that. Love may be a fairer flower, but even love roots in duty. Filial gratitude ought to turn the heart of the strong town and city church countryward. The worst of wretches is the ingrate ashamed or neglectful of his mother.

In the providences of God our fathers, far-seeing men, wrought in the country. This gave us a rural constituency, some of which yesterday moved to the city, and tomorrow will be the dominant force there. The service and sacrifice of the fathers challenge us to be worthy successors. They "endured as seeing Him who is invisible," "looking unto the recompense of reward" the success of their and their Master's cause.

As we stand looking into the sheet of rural opportunity lowered from heaven before our eyes, let us not hastily pronounce its contents common and unclean. As a means of saving the nation, the church, ourselves, we must save the country church.

The City Church

By R. H. Miller

The race is not going back to Eden but forward to the New Jerusalem. Both economic and spiritual forces are building the colossal city of the apocalypse into which they shall bring the honor and glory of the nations. Intensive agriculture, the increase of manufacture, the growing interdependence of men, the development of the social yearning, the fulfillment of the individual, all point to the continued and unlimited growth of cities.

The city is the only area which can furnish an adequate field for the full expression of the church as a Christian force. But Christianity is on trial in the modern city. It is the only place where faith's combat hangs in the balance. There the battle is being pressed to the gates. The church is barely holding its ground in the city. "We have reached one of the nodes in the interesting orbits of the church and world at which the action of the church becomes unspeakably important."

The Need of Adaptation.

The church in the modern city faces very much the same conditions as obtain on the foreign mission field. There is need for understanding and adaptation. In too many cases "The Little Brown Church in the Wildwood" is preserved in the city church which like "The Lincoln Memorial" is a splendid mausoleum for a relic. The traditional organization, forms of worship and methods of work are continued without regard to their fitness for the situation. There is no divine authority for Gothic architecture or an invariable calendar of services. There was a divine prescience in establishing within the primitive church a rigidity of faith with elasticity of organization.

Disciples Growing in Cities.

The largest growth for Disciples in the past ten years has been in the city. We are rapidly becoming an urban people. And if we are to conserve the splendid results of our sane and appealing evangelism we must centralize and unify. The loose and stray organization which served the first period of our growth will not solve the pressing problems of city evangelization. The present organization of both the average church and our general and representative agencies is entirely inadequate to the work. If this means ecclesiasticism, then an ecclesiasticism which lives and functions for present efficiency is far preferable to one that rubs the brasses of a tomb. The traditional forms and methods are too small and weak. The old bottles break and the new wine seeks new vehicles and channels. The result is that the children of light. An increasing clamorously urged while the church is denounced for failure. The spirit and ideals of the church are being represented by social reformers who in applying Christian principles to modern muncipal conditions are wiser than the children of light. An increasing number of social ministries are being conducted without spiritual reference.

Statement of Principles.

The crisis of the city is moral rather than economic. Legislation and civic commissions may do much to enlarge, protect, enrich and beautify the city to make it clean and safe and healthful—but the fundamental elements of civic salvation are the "willed elements" and these can be adjusted only through a regenerated and patriotic citizenship. The need is for heart and conscience. The callous injustice, the glaring evils, the industrial cruelty and squalid wretchedness of the city are accepted as inevitable accompaniments of the social scheme. The conscience and moral standards of the individual have gone over to the social conscience and group morality.

The city church has, therefore, a prophetic office. It must cry aloud and hold not its peace concerning municipal evils. There is no social force equal to an awakened conscience. It is the supreme business of the church to make the Christian motive dominant in the city,—to shape public opinion toward the principles of Jesus,—to fill the body politic with a nobler spirit and aid in the growth of good-will. The pulpit must offset the "full dinner pail" argument of the political office seeker and the social agitator by exalting human values above the bread line.

Must Maintain Distinctive Character.

It is the paramount duty of the church to maintain its essential character and distinctive teachings. Christianity cannot save the city by abandoning the church. Nor can the church endure by surrendering its sources of power and undertaking the political and social work of the society which it has Christianized for that very purpose. There is no respect for the church which in order to win a crowd gives up the very secret of influence and usefulness. The city does not want the church to be a theater, a labor union, a club or a hospital. In too many churches there is more of the sound of revelry than the voice of prayer; more of the odor of soup and antiseptics than sanctity.

The liberal church makes less headway than the "old fashioned." Critical intellectualism makes less appeal than simple piety. The curious crowd is sterile. One "up-to-the-minute" preacher is "milking the barren heifer and the other is holding the seive." The city will repent on the preaching of a prophet. It laughs at the antics of a clown. Sensational clap-trap may catch an occasional "thrill hunter" but the soul of the vexed and wistful patriot rises only to the heavenly lure. The city's "hell cannot be slacked with culture; it must be drenched with blood."

Social Disintegration.

One of the vexing problems of the city is caused by the social disintegration. The city it not composite but componental. The nations already walk in the light of it. The denser the population the deeper and darker is the social cleavage. Neighborliness is in inverse ratio to the nearness of the neighbor's house. A street, a river, a park may separate populations as foreign to each other as if divided by oceans. The city presents the paradox of being anti-social. Industrial oppression, racial and class antipathies, instability of residence, and denominational affiliations all contribute to the anomaly of the condition in which as people huddle closer together society settles farther apart.

Social intregation is the great work of the hour. The city waits for the reconciling word and spirit which will bring together classes now straining apart and cutting industrial and social life with fissures as deep and threatening as hell. Neither political parties nor commercial laws can realize the reconciliation. The true integrating force is spiritual. The Christian man alone has motives big enough and strong enough to suit himself to his fellows in all the numerous ways that strengthen society.

"The Brotherhood of the Carpenter."

City churches have failed mostly through social exclusiveness. The caste spirit has pervaded the household of faith and churches are located and administered with respect to class distinctions. The currents of social life coagulate in churches where they should be warmed and revitalized. We have not yet approximated the divine type. The idea of universal brotherhood was born in the Christian church. Christ pushed back the walls and extended the roof tree of the home when he said "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister and mother." He announced the sole law of social concord in the new commandment "that ye love one another." The Sermon on the Mount is a charter of fraternity and a treaty of social peace and harmony.

Primitive Church.

The primitive church ignored imperial types and titles and appropriated the vocabulary and customs of the family as best adapted to manifest the relation of disciples. The most sacred and significant ordinances were typical of birth and the family meal. The meeting place of the congregation was ordinarily a home where rich and poor sat down together in the intimacies and blessings of family life. Worship was accompanied by friendliness, helpfulness, mutual respect and interest, the sharing of fortune and continuous fellowship.

The Roman world was conquered not by an army, a school or a cult but by a brotherhood signed with the sign of the cross. Love introduced into ancient social relationships did what law and force could not do.

The chiefest contribution the church can make to the city is such a brotherhood. The loving, serving, sacrificing society of brothers organized under the spirit of the crucified friend of publicans and sinners who made his grave with the rich is the church the city is calling for with passionate insistence. The pressure of business, the limitation of living quarters, the unsociablity of neighborhoods, the hardness of city life throw upon the church the duty of providing the larger home where fundamental social obligations and ennobling relationships may find expression.

Significance of Brotherhood.

To the man who under the preaching of the apostles, had forsaken father and mother and brother and sister, the term "brother" had a tender significance. The necessities of livelihood break up the family circle, disband friendly groups and separate from the church of childhood. The social atmosphere is hard and tense. If the church can teach men to give that word "brother" its original meaning the whole air of the city will become golden with love and peace.

The Recovery of the Individual.

The city represents aggregated life—the human mass. The city sacrifices living men upon the altar of "the colossal man." The vocabulary of the city is of races, classes, groups. Industrialism and socialism combine to destroy the individual. The man is completely submerged and only a few bubbles on the surface of the rising tide of socialism indicate where the struggling individual went down.

The function of the church is to preserve the individual, to enchance his worth, accountability. There is no social gospel except that which commands men everywhere to repent and obey the gospel. There is no social salvation except as individuals are renewed by the vitalities of the cross. Commissioner Fosdick of New York says out of intimate acquaintance with evils and knowledge of redemptive agencies "there is but one cure and that is the slow process of individual regeneration."

The Curse of Nominal Membership.

The greatest encumbrance of the city church today is its nominal membership. Brethren, we need not introduce an associate membership. We have it now. Thousands of church members without the faith of the saints or the obligations of the damned. Clouds without dew; wells without water; lamps without light. They are working more mischief in the world than agnosticism and sectarianism. They will pull down the standards of church efficiency; they wrest the principles of the gospel in business; they oppress the poor; they capitalize sin; they openly disregard Christian duties; they belittle loyalty and self-control; they blur the edges of Christlike separateness by offensive worldliness and in the name of liberality compromise every article of faith and obedience. They come into the church in "sealed packages" and are neither washed by baptism nor warmed by the spirit.

The City Mission.

The city mission is the alimony which the church pays to the down-town district which it has abandoned and its children are "brought up" by charity. It is the church's poor relation and is expected to be satisfied with the droppings of the table. Like the Christmas Charity Barrel it contains the wealthy brother's cast-offs and old styles. It is feeble, desolate and thankless.

The city mission is the outstanding failure of the church in attempting the city problem. It lacks the appearance of substantialness and sincerity. It fails of social understanding and sympathy between classmen. It lacks the note of assurance and authority. It presents a mutilated and unrecognizable Christ to the people he came to save. It neglects the ordinances that seal the right and worth of the individual and offers a pen for herding sick sheep rather than a home for prodigal children.

Fellowship Cannot be Hired.

Brethren, we cannot hire such fellowship as that of Paul and Onesimus done by proxy. The boarding house and tenement districts of our cities need churches fully organized and equipped and manned both to preach and practice the whole gospel of Christ. They need association through actual membership and co-operation of the cultured and prosperous. Their need is a challenge to our best, not an excuse for our least.

The Institutional Church is to the neglected sections of the city what the modern mission is to the foreign field. It seeks to understand and minister to the whole man in the name of Christ. It is an answer to those who under existing conditions must look to the church to satisfy almost every human need. It is the return of the church to the simplicity of faith and the comprehensiveness of ministry of the apostolic church.

The Institutional Church.

The best statement of the purpose of the institutional church may be quoted from the platform of the Open and Institutional Church League,—"As the body of Christ, the open and institutional church aims to provide the material environment through which his spirit may be practically expressed. As his representative in the world it seeks to represent him physically, intellectually, socially and spiritually to the age in which it exists. In as much as the Christ came not to be ministered unto but to minister, the institutional church, filled and moved by his spirit of ministering love, seeks to become the center and source of all beneficent and philanthropic effort, and to take the leading part in every movement which has for its end the alleviation of human suffering, the elevation of man, and the betterment of the world."

Such is the institutional church. It is costly in men and means, but through it the wretched poor, the outcast, the publican and sinner, who are the more costly by-products of the city's greatness, enter the kingdom which can add all things unto them.

In the redemption of the city the way of love is the way of life. You cannot get society any more than the individual into the city which hath foundation but by the way of the cross.

THE NOVEMBER FLOWER GARDEN

There is always a tinge of sadness in closing a pleasant chapter in one's life, and it is with genuine regret that the writer of this series of garden studies writes the word finis at the end of this article on the November Flower Garden.

It is as though a long deferred farewell were at last spoken, and this floral season had gone to join the long procession of other years of bloom and beauty, that are now only existing in the book of loving remembrance. However, some one will doubtless think the good-byes should have been said a month ago, and ask, "Where is your November flower garden? What blossoms have the killing frosts left us but a few defeated looking hardy chrysanthemums? An article on flowers in November will have to be like Artemus Ward's lecture on Africa where he never mentioned the dark continent but once, and that was to say that the only rose that flourished there was the negroes."

In Quest of the November Garden.

That might be true, good critic, if Lexington and Central Kentucky (where these articles are written) were the whole earth —as some of us fondly and proudly think; but there are places where the November flower garden is possibly the most beautiful of the year.

Let us assume that the gardner of the Woman's Page, urged by her passion for flowers, started forth in search of the ideal fall garden, and traveled over five hundred miles before she found it. As she traversed the mountain regions of Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia, she thought that this might be more truly called the blooming time of the trees than the spring, for the mountain slopes were veritable bouquets. It seemed as though Mother Nature, like the doting patriarch of the Bible, had clothed her favorite children, the greenwood trees, in their annual coat of many colors—such a riot of brilliant hues greeted the eyes on every side. No midsummer flower garden could equal the splendor of the gold and crimson and emerald tints, and all the lovely shades that come between those extremes of the color scale.

Colors Grow More Intense.

As the train raced further south, the color scheme grew more intense. The oaks, which are clad here in a sober living of russet and brown, became more rich and varied in hue; great groups of them were blood red, with that burnished glaze upon them, as though they had been freshly varnished. The dogwoods and sumacs, beautiful as they are with us, became more vividly scarlet, while the sweet-gums had all the glory of our sugar maples, with an indiscribable shade all their own. The hickories and tulips glowed like clear gold against a background of somber pines. The sky was clouded for most of the journey, but now and then patches of color would glide past, so brilliant that one could hardly believe the sun was not shining on them; they brought to mind the lines of the old poet:

"For o'er the leaves before they fall,
Such hues hath nature thrown,
The woods wear in the sunless days,
A sunshine of their own."

A Property Owning Tree.

As we rushed through this pageant of color, interspersed now and then with the green gloom of stately pine forests, it seemed as though nothing could be more beautiful—until we reached our "land of heart's desire," an old town in central Georgia. Then we felt we were, indeed, away down South in Dixie. For there we saw on the streets and in the yards superb live oaks and magnolias, the quaint China trees, the bay tree, the crepe myrtles, and the cape jessamine. And we found there a unique example of love of trees, that might have graced the days of the oak worshipping Druids.

A new street was to be opened in the town, which threw a beautiful old oak in the road; the owner refused to let the land be used, unless the tree was safe-guarded. In order to protect it perpetually, he deeded the surrounding ground to the tree itself—the street was opened on those conditions, and the deed is recorded in the court house. This southern oak is probably the only tree in the world that is a legal property owner—would that there were others! Certainly, this is an omen of a better day in forestry, and should make all the trees of the woods clap their hands, as the Psalmist advised them to do.

The Fall Garden of Dreams.

And in this old Georgia town, I found the end of my quest—my fall garden of dreams. If a large number of persons were asked to express their preference for their favorite flower, the vote would probably be evenly divided between the rose, the violet, and the chrysanthemum; a garden, then, that was composed of these choice types of form and fragrance and color might be truly called the perfect garden. Here in this charming place, I found the yards filled with these floral favorites; the beds and the walks were bordered with sweet violets, now in the zenith of their fall bloom. And the roses! —would that there was speech delectable enough to tell how sweet and beautiful they were! All the exquisite tea roses that we see only under glass at home, climbing gayly over porches and pillars, or standing in sturdy masses along the fences, in a perfect wealth and profusion of bloom.

Chrysanthemums on Native Heath.

But the chrysanthemums were indeed on their native heath here, and this was preemently their season. The violets had bloomed before in the spring, the roses in the summer, but these peerless blossoms entered first upon their kingdom in the fall. I have never seen such chrysanthemums growing anywhere outside of a flower show—they were truly specimen plants, both for their size, their shape, and their exquisite range of color. And they were massed with so generous and lavish a hand, that they gave a fulness of joy, that one never gets from plants grown under artificial conditions. I felt several times that I must go in and thank the owners of these gardens for the pleasure they had given me, and was only restrained by the fear of being spurned as a person of unsound mind. The queen of fall flowers finds an ideal environment in this old southern town; the soil is there, the climate is there, and the owners of its multitude of stately colonial homes have the wealth and the appreciation of this incomparable flower, to give it the care and culture it so richly deserves.

So, we may take comfort in thinking, though our own gardens are but a memory now, that there are happy places where the November flower garden is the ideal flower garden of the year. I. W. H.

Keeping the Play Spirit

When in health the child lives for play, the youth for pleasure. The occupations of adults can seldom be called anything but work for, besides the army of wage-earners filling up each day's measure of labor, millionaires must groan beneath the task of guarding and spending and giving away. Women of fashion must strive early and late to keep their looks and to be well gowned and "in the swim;" the Mrs. Jellybys must be swamped in letter-writting and appointments; and the golf enthusiast and football stars must keep up their muscle with hard exercise. The occupation does not count; it is the spirit in which it is done. All the happiness that play and pleasuring have above work is in the heart of the doer. It takes bare labor or its equivalent to dam a meadow brook, to stir up mud pies, to dance till the small hours, to golf, or tramp, or to be brilliant at dinners and teas. Froebel taught the schools that much that had been made into irksome tasks could be even better done as play. Who shall bring in a like emancipation for us grown-up pupils in life's school? We can scarcely make play out of our same old monotonous every-day tasks; but we can try to cultivate the child's carefree, hopeful spirit.—The Congregationalist.

Bliggerson's Degree

Thomas Henry Bliggerson
Longed for a degree,
"Like to sign
This name of mine
With a tail of LL.D.,"

Said he.

"Or a Ph.D., or a plain A. B.,
Or any old letters would give me glee."
And he gave away
All his cash one day
To a school and a college and a libraree.

Thomas Henry Bliggerson
Looked for his degree—
Watched the mail
Till hope would fail,
For a note to give him glee.

You see.

He fully expected he would be,
At once created an X. Y. Z.,
Or an LL.D.,
Or a plain A. B.;
But the poor man wasn't even 1-2-3.

Thomas Henry Bliggerson
Now has his degree.
Each thing sent
His establishment
Bears mystic letters three.

You see,

There was no more cash in his treasury,
And he went down into bankruptcy.
So the credit men,
With a large fat pen,
Write "T. H. Bliggerson, C. O. D."

Russian Delegates Kept Busy.

During their stay in Chicago Prof. Martin Schmidt and Alexander Persianoff, of St. Petersburg, Russia, were kept busy by the churches. Mr. Persianoff was accompanied by Basil S. Keusseff, leader of Chicago's Russian mission, to act as his interpreter. Prof. Schmidt, speaking English with a degree of fluency, made a number of appointments. He is to be a teacher of theology in the new Bible college at St. Petersburg, a grant for the establishment of which has just been allowed by the government.

Hopkinsville's Good Year.

The Hopkinsville, Ky., church, Harry D. Smith, pastor, has within it a company of people pledged by a solemn pact to attend the prayer-meeting regularly throughout the year. This church reports a membership of 936, an average attendance at Sunday-school of 262, an expenditure for self support of $7,245.76, and for all missions and charities of $4,281.28, a total of $11,527.04, during their fiscal year just ending. The activities of this church and its pastor reach very intimately into the general life of the community.

City Sunday School Superintendents Confer.

One of the features of Indianapolis church life is a monthly meeting of the superintendents of Disciples' Sunday-schools. The October meeting was planned as a recognition of the new Sunday-school officers who were beginning their service with the new season. Among others T. W. Grafton, pastor of Third Church, spoke on the importance of the utmost co-operation between the pastor and superintendent. West Park Church recently adopted the combination service of worship and Bible study instead of the two services, Sunday-school and "church." It was stated that the plan is well-liked and promises to solve some problems. Central Sunday-school has long been distinctive in its devotional atmosphere and its superintendent, Mr. Stacy, said this was partially the result of a carefully prepared program. The music, the Scripture reading, the prayers, and all parts of the service are arranged carefully beforehand, leaving nothing to chance or impulse.

Alluring But Not Commanding.

Here is a declination letter that reads like a moral tonic. It is from E. F. Daugherty of Vincennes, Ind., to the pastoral committee of Pasadena, Cal., church. It appears in the parish paper of that church and it brings disappointment to the worthy congregation that enthusiastically called the Vincennes pastor to the western field. A paragraph shows the stuff this Indiana preacher is made of: "Had you convinced me in prior communications that you were offering me a larger chance in service than is on my hands and heart in Vincennes, I could have had not one iota of hesitancy in accepting the chance, but coming as a prospect with no element of 'oughtness' in it, I have to discount your fine town and incomparable skies and gracious people and regretfully acknowledge my sense of 'oughtness' in staying on my present job; all my desire being toward your city, all my sense of duty being centered in my present field—and any man with a scrap of honor where desire and duty collide, is forced to stand by duty, for the maintenance of his self-respect."

Jacksonville Church Eighty Years Old.

Eighty years ago the Christian Church in Jacksonville, Ill., was organized. The event was celebrated by the congregation on the last Sunday of October. The church was organized by Barton W. Stone in 1832. In 1834 Mr. Stone and his family came to Jacksonville to live, where he remained until his death in 1844. "A review of the church history," said Clyde Darsie, the pastor, at the celebration, "seems to indicate that it includes three periods: First, the period of the broad vision of the pioneers; second, the period of contention and literal interpretation which preceded and followed the time of the civil war; third, the period of modern enlargement and spiritual development." Many notable names make up the succession of pastors. In the early period the name of Andrew J. Kane, the death of whose widow at the age of eighty-five, was recorded in these pages last week, stands most conspicuous. After the "period of contention" are found the names of Enos Campbell, J. Madison Williams, John W. Allen, A. N. Gilbert, Samuel B. Moore, George L. Snively and Russell F. Thrapp. The pastorate of Mr. Thrapp was characterized by Mr. Darsie as "conspicuous in missionary expansion and progressive civic reform."

Wearing Your Own Clothes.

Too many persons ape the mannerisms, follow the methods and use the ideas of others instead of thinking and acting for themselves, according to George Hamilton Combs, pastor of Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, who preached on a recent Sunday night on "Wearing Your Own Clothes." "All that the past has produced does not constitute one perfected thing for the individual soul. It has given only the raw material. And yet we always rely on other people and other years for our garments. But God never made two plans for a life alike. That which suits you may not suit me. Each spirit must weave its own clothes and yet we are always leaning upon someone else, always striving to take on the manners and ideas of others, forgetting that God wants us to think and feel and act for ourselves. It is every man for himself. We should not go to the past for our clothes. I do not mean that we should not venerate the past, for it should be to us a great inspiration. Lean on your father's work if you will; it should be your inspiration, but it cannot clothe your own spirit. There is no place in life for the man who does not move. I would more likely think of wearing the clothes of a dead ancestor than I would of using his ideas and methods as my own. New times make new ideas and new duties. You need to be a voice not an echo. You must learn to know yourself. It is introspection that clothes your spirit, and it is the hardest thing in the world to get a correct view of yourself as you really are. You need to know your resistances and in a larger way your capabilities. It is not so much what you can stand as what you can do. I have a contempt for cheap books that tell you how to get rich, for they do not do it. If Rockefeller would write a book and tell how he succeeded, I doubt if it would help very much. But we can get something of his daring and his skill by thinking and acting for ourselves. God gave you something in your brain. Then speak it as he gave it to you to speak. It is your right, your wrong, your standard and your duty. Do things originally. Think and act for yourself."

Louisville Convention Reports.

The editor's mail, since the Louisville convention, has consisted mainly of letters of appreciation of the two reports of the Louisville convention, that which appeared in the Courier-Journal and that which appeared in The Christian Century. These letters come from all parts of the country. All of them are cherished as the chiefest reward of a week of hard labor. It would not be becoming to publish these letters, but from among them, and typical of the rest, we select this one written by Harry D. Smith, of Hopkinsville, Ky., president of the American Christian Missionary Society for 1911:

"Dear Brother Morrison: Your reports of the Louisville Convention were of interest to me as indeed is everything you write, however I may from time to time feel called upon to differ from you in opinion. The spirit of your writing is most felicitous, doubtless because it has been gotten from the Master of us all who is gentle and gracious. I wish to thank you for the pleasure I have had in your reports. It was a most notable convention to which as to a landmark I doubt not we shall look for many years."

Words like these, together with E. L. Powells' message saying that "the first adequate newspaper interpretation of any convention in our history was that of the Louisville convention given by the Courier Journal," and the grateful word expressed in person by J. B. Briney for the "impartial and fair way in which the issues of the convention were reported." make the editor's heart glad—and humble. The task was conceived as an opportunity to serve the Disciples' cause by setting forth their ideals and achievements to the general public reached by Col. Watterson's great newspaper, and any partisan treatment of events or issues would have been not only bad journalism, but repugnant to the writers feelings and convictions. If the newspaper's interpretation carried the spirit of the convention to those readers who were not there, if it enhanced somewhat the prestige of our people and our message, and if it reacted wholesomely upon the convention itself it should suggest to some other writer, more apt than the editor in the fine art of reporting, the doing of a similar service for future conventions.

Eight Addresses on Christian Union.

The eight addresses delivered at the Christian Union conference held in London in 1910 have been published in a little book that lies before us with the title "Christian Union." It is the work of the Christian Association of which Leslie W. Morgan is secretary. Mr. Morgan writes an interesting foreword setting out the purposes of the conference and interpreting the agreement underlying the variety of points of view in the addresses. The speakers were, he says, distinctly informed that they were left free to speak their own minds. Mr. Morgan continues:

"It is an encouraging sign of the times that the speakers so freely took advantage of this quite natural liberty which was granted them, and used the utmost freedom of speech, not only as related to the teachings of the various denominations, but freedom also in their treatment of doctrines and practices of their own denominations. When a Baptist declares that he would do little to make a man a Baptist, but would do much to make him a Christian; when a prominent clergyman of the Church of England does not so much as mention episcopacy in an address on the bases of union, and only refers to uniformity to exclude it; when two young Disciples show sufficient independence to express opinions contrary to the commonly accepted teaching and practice of their people; and when a Congregationalist makes known the fact that he once wrote an introduction to a book on baptism, written by two Congregationalists, in which he set forth the Baptist position on that ordinance so strongly that he convinced a number of ordinary good Congregationalists that that position was correct, sectarianism is in a bad way, but the kingdom of God will abound. It is the hope of the kingdom of God, if the despair of denominationalism! These speakers may not be right—and many in their own respective religious bodies may denounce then as wrong—but at any rate they are so far free from denominational fetters. This is hopeful in the interest of truth."

The contributors to the volume are: Rev. T. E. Ruth (Baptist), Pres. Archibald McLean (Disciple), Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, M. A. (Church of England), Prof. Errett Gates, Ph. D. (Disciple), Rev. W. L. Watkinson, D. D., LL. D. (Wesleyan), Rev. Charles Clayton Morrison (Disciple), Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M. A., M. P. (Congregationalist), and Dr. J. H. Garrison (Disciple)

The price does not appear on the booklet, but we would guess that an international money order for 50 cents sent to Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, Wringcliff, Priory Road, Hornsey, London, would get the sender a copy by return mail.

Co-operative District Evangelistic Campaign.

That the churches in the northern district of Colorado, where such cities as Boulder, Ft. Collins and Greeley are situated, have achieved a high degree of unity is shown in a co-operative campaign of evangelism which has just been launched in which every church and pastor in the district participates. The plan is to hold an evangelistic meeting in every church in the district, to man each meeting by forces within the district without the aid of professional revivalists, and to make each meeting an object of attention and prayer for all the churches. From two to five pastors, one of whom is the evangelistic preacher, share the work together in each community. The particular number of pastors in a given place is determined by the size of the field and the amount of personal work deemed necessary. Each pastor donates the extra work and is released by his own congregation on full pay while he is engaged in this work. All pastors are in their own pulpits on Sundays, except the one doing the preaching, and his pulpit is filled by the pastor of the church where the meeting is being held. Each church bears the expense of its own meeting, if able, but if not able to do so a fund has been provided by the district on which to draw, so that the smaller churches are insured a meeting equal in the character of its leadership to that enjoyed by the larger and stronger churches. No pastor is expected to be absent from his own field in the month immediately preceding or that immediately following the meeting held for his own church.

It is believed that this form of evangelism will acquaint the churches of the district one with another, make each church conscious of its larger organic unity with its neighbors, and produce evangelistic results of a more permanent character than are too often found to follow the "high-pressure" meetings of professional evangelists. A singing evangelist is employed for the entire series.

The first meeting of the campaign is now in progress with the church at Boulder, with J. L. Thompson of Greeley as evangelist, Arthur L. Haley, of Canyon City, leading the singing, and Chas. Lemuel Dean of Loveland, assisting the pastor, J. F. Bickel, in personal work. Next in the series will be Ft. Collins and Berthoud. J. D. Garrison, who has recently taken charge of the church at Ft. Collins, will do the evangelistic preaching there, assisted by a singer, and C. L. Dean of Loveland. The meeting at Berthoud will be conducted by A. S. Dowd as evangelistic preacher, assisted by a singer and the pastor, W. F. Bruce.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

We are very sorry that the names of J. Newton Cloe of Mt. Pulaski and W. H. Blake of Woodlawn, were accidentally omitted from the list of preachers in the new Year Book. These are good and worthy men and their names ought to be in the list. It is our blunder.

C. H. Metcalf, of Girard, is the kind of "preacher's friend" that ought to be in every church in the land. He sent their minister, H. L. Lewis, to the Louisville convention and paid his expenses.

We are beginning to hear from the November offering and we are hoping for a generous response to the call. Our good folks will give if the great need is fairly laid before them by a faithful missionary ministry. Tell of the results; tell of the needy fields; tell of the heroic sacrifices of our state missionaries of the thousands of foreigners in the state; the need of an evangelist in every district; of Chicago and the city problems; of the need of rural community builders and specialists. Illinois is a great rich needy mission field today, and our good Disciples will give liberally if the story is faithfully told.

THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

Toronto News

The church at Guelph, Ont., is beginning a meeting, led by Ben. N. Mitchell. We are hoping that the church may secure him as pastor.

The Cecil St. Church, Toronto, has a capable Sunday-school superintendent in Prof. E. F. Burton, of the University of Toronto. The school has adopted the Graded lessons, and has begun the course this fall.

R. W. Stevenson, whose eloquence won the next convention for Toronto, has recently built an addition to the St. Clarens Ave. Church to accommodate a growing Sunday-school.

The Monroe Doctrine is afloat in Toronto. D. Munro preaches it at Wychwood, and Wilmer Monroe heralds it at the Keele St. Church. We hear no complaints.

The church at Grand Valley, Ont., will observe anniversary Sunday, Nov. 10. C. O. Reynard, of the Cecil St. Church, will be the speaker for the day, exchanging with the pastor, G. F. Assiter.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement was born in Toronto five years ago. The fifth anniversary of that important event was observed on Nov. 9, by a meeting, addressed by Mr. J. Campbell White, at the St. James Parish House. C. O. R.

Foreign Society News

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of October amounted to $7,018, an increase over the corresponding month last year of $1,529. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools and Endeavor societies and individual gifts.

It will be sad news to many missionaries to learn that Mrs. R. G. Platt of Liverpool, England, passed away recently. Mrs. Platt made a beautiful Christian home for scores of weary missionaries as they passed to and from their various fields of labor. She was a faithful Disciple of Christ.

The number of native evangelists and other native workers on the foreign field in the service of the Foreign Society is 1,085, a gain of 326 during the past year. During the past ten years the number of the native force has leaped from 223 to 1,085, a gain of 386 per cent.

During the past missionary year eleven new churches were organized in the regions beyond 2,422 were baptized, a gain of 419 over the year before. The present membership numbers 13,568. There are 101 cnurch buildings valued at $187,452.

Also during the past missionary year twenty-five Sunday-schools were organized. The total number of Sunday-schools now conducted by our foreign missionary force is 273, and there are 18,398 in these schools, a gain of 3,298 in the year closed. It is gratifying to note that the number of Sunday-schools on the foreign fields has grown from ninety-six in 1902 to 273 in 1912, or an increase of 182 per cent in ten years.

At the last meeting of the executive committee, November 1, Mr. and Mrs. George R. Quiggan of Birkenhead, England, were appointed missionaries to go to Japan. They will not enter that field, however, for about one year. Mr. Quiggan is a graduate of Hiram College. He married a daughter of Joe Coop of Southport, England, who is so well and favorably known to our brotherhood generally. These splendid young people are exceptionally well prepared in mind and heart for work in the Sunrise Kingdom.

At the same meeting of the executive committee, Miss Lulu Snyder of Muncie, Ind., was appointed a missionary to Nanking, China, to be associated with Miss Mary Kelly. It will be remembered that Miss Kelly works at what is known as the South Gate, Nanking. Miss Snyder took high rank in her studies at Transylvania University. She has done good work in her local congregation at home. Miss Kelly is in great need of someone to be associated with her in her trying experiences.

Steps have been taken to put up a new building on our Bible College Campus in Tokyo, Japan. It will be used, not only for a classroom,, but also for a church room for the congregation which has grown up in and about Takingawa. This is an important step and we are much gratified to be able to help along.

Mrs. Harper, the mother of Mrs. D. E. Dannenberg, who has been visiting for a time in Nanking, has recently been employed as a matron of the Girls' School in Nanking. She will be associated with Miss Emma Lyon.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

Home Mission Notes

M. M. Moss, minister of the First Christian Church of Vancouver, reports a new house worth $5,000 on a lot worth $5,250, dedicated October 20, with all financial obligations provided for in pledges. A meeting is in progress, with twenty-one additions to the church and a good prospect for many more. J. W. Baker is assisting.

A new church was organized October 20, at San Antonio, Texas, Hugh McLellan assisted the pastor, Albert T. Fitts, in an ordination service wherein two elders and three deacons were set apart for the holy ministry of the new congregation. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of 127.

Dr. E. Olson, in his campaing for Scandinavian missions, reports $3,500 in new pledges in the past month. He expects to raise $50,000 by April 1, 1913. While canvassing for funds he is holding a meeting at Mankato and other places; he has received 270 additions to the church.

M. B. Ryan, evangelist in the province of Alberta, Canada, reports a new church nearing completion and ready for dedication November 17, at Clyde. He cannot answer all the calls for evangelistic meetings and regular preaching stations. The cause is growing in the province.

An intinery of the two Russian delegates to our International Convention, is being made among the churches. Prof. Martin Schmidt and Evangelist Alex Persianoff, are scholarly, Christian gentlemen and have endeared themselves to every group of Disciples and churches they have visited. They have been assisting Basil Keusseff in Chicago, and were received with great enthusiasm in a union meeting of Chicago churches, Oct. 27. Professor Schmidt and Dr. Louis Patmont, with Homer E. Sala, field agent of the A. C. M. S., are having enthusiastic meetings in their itinerary among churches From Peoria, Eureka and Indianapolis come gratifying reports of the impression these guests of the whole church are making. They are conducting an educational campaign and enforcing their plea for work among foreigners in the the home land by concrete examples of the practicability and effectiveness of work already done. Our Russian Mission in Chicago must have $25,000 within the next few months to meet our obligation to the 400,000 former resients of Russia now living in that city. Our Russian missions in New York and Newark, New Jersey, have proven their value by the conversions they have already made. They must have $30,000 to give them permanency and adequate equipment.

The American Christian Missionary Society is vitally connected with the nation-wide enterprise of bringing to the consciousness of the church America's perils and religious needs. The home missions campaign begun September 1, is like a rising tide. New facts sent to all Protestant pastors are echoed from pulpits and platforms to eager listeners. The Home Society is anxious that the churches of Christ will see their day of visitation. The educational value of such a campaign cannot be estimated. Immediate and delayed results will vindicate the wisdom of such an undertaking.

From churches using the budget method and the duplex envelope the home board has monthly remittances which greatly relieve its necessities and encourages the brethren. The ElPaso church, Perry J. Rice, pastor, has just sent $350 for the A C. M. S.. This significant statement accompanies: "We have a small balance in our missionary treasury and are planning an aggressive campaign to enlist all our members for regular contribution next year."

MARGARET SLATTERY'S BOOKS OF INSPIRATION AND UPLIFT

Probably there is no more brilliant speaker in the Sunday School world today and no greater authority on Teacher Training than Miss Margaret Slattery

Teachers and Teachers of Teachers all over the country depend on Miss Slattery for Counsel and Inspiration.

It is because Miss Slattery is herself a living teacher that whatever she says or writes has the force and quality of actual living, fruitful experience. Her keen interest in human life, her wide knowledge of its conditions, and her thorough professional training enable her to reach the heart of the Sunday school teaching problem in all its phases.

Boys and Girls who know her are no less eager to claim her as their friend and adviser.

Living Teachers

Prof. Edward P. St. John says: "I have read Miss Slattery's 'Living Teachers' with very great pleasure. It is an inspiring message."

Rev. A. F. Schauffler writes: "'Living Teachers' is a brilliant little brochure which every teacher in the land, whether in the Sunday school or the day school, should read."

Dr. Winship says: "I went without my mid-day meal today just to read 'Living Teachers' within a half hour of its coming. Every sentence is alive and it brings new life to me." —Journal of Education.

Mr. Frank L. Brown, Superintendent of the Bushwick Avenue Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, Brooklyn, says: "To read the book is to be haunted with the vision of a life possibility that must be realized."

Discusses most attractively the art of teaching. — Baptist World.

A vital, inspiring, uplifting message to teachers. It may be read through at a sitting, and is helpful to mothers and fathers and to day and Sunday school teachers.—Christian Observer.

Miss Slattery has a style of writing which is impressive, interesting, fascinating and instructive. This book merits a large circulation. Its pages are as fresh and breezy as a summer morn in June.

The Teacher's Candlestick

In this little brochure we are told of the seven lamps of Knowledge, Training, Example, Perseverance, Enthusiasm, Sympathy and Faith, which are the shining lights in the candlestick of the truly successful Sunday School teacher. The author presents in a striking way the great truths which she seeks to inculcate, and enforces them by appropriate and pertinent illustrations, many of which are gathered out of her own personal experiences. — American Messenger.

Miss Slattery draws a large audience, because she speaks out of rich experience and keen observation. A teacher, she is able to tell how to teach, and in this book are gathered choice thoughts and suggestions, with all the charm of her public talks. Teachers and parents will do well to possess this book. — The Watchman.

A Guide for Teachers of Training Classes

As yet almost nothing has appeared in Sunday School literature which gives direct and sympathetic help to the teachers of training classes, and it is believed that this Guide will furnish very practical help to all teachers of training classes. The Guide discusses The Training Teacher, the Class, Time and Place of Meeting, Subjects for Study, Original Work, Examinations, Credits, Certificates, the Social Life of the Class, The Great Objective. These chapters are followed by specific directions, a list of Optional Courses, Reading Courses, Books for Special Study, and other helpful suggestions.

THE BEST BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Beautifully printed in two colors, with illustrations, decorative borders, unique end leaves, etc. 178 pages.
Price 75 cents net. Postage 10 cents.

This volume, for young people between the ages of sixteen and twenty, is by far the best and most significant book Miss Slattery has ever written. It is remarkable in its closeness to the practical needs of youth, and while lofty in ideal never loses sight of the actual problems of every-day life. Like all Miss Slattery's work, the book is distinguished by uncommon insight and sympathy, and her particularly happy gift for apt and telling illustration is obvious here. The boy or girl who takes up Just Over the Hill will read on and on because he will find there real answers to many troublesome questions and many new and vital ideas. Seldom are the qualities of helpfulness and power to interest so delightfully blended as in this book.

The Church Coming into its Own

IN THE UNITED STATES THE PROTESTANT Church has a membership of 24,000,000 and an adherency of 60,000,000, with a Sunday-school enrollment of 16,000,000; it has 162,000 ordained ministers, 215,000 church organizations, 210,000 church buildings with a seating capacity of 60,000,000, and a total valuation of $1,300,000,000.

The Church has it in its power to determine the social and ethical standards which shall govern the nation, so that when the organized Protestant forces of the United States get together for an educational campaign on American social and religious conditions, and are really in earnest about the task, it means that something is about to happen. There have been "movements" of various kinds conducted by groups of Church people during recent years, but the three months' campaign officially inaugurated by thirty-six national home missionary societies, culminating in Home Mission Week November 17-24, inclusive, has back of it a group of organizations, which are the most substantial, and perhaps, therefore, the most conservative in the Church. They have under their direction thousands of trained workers among various classes and in different sections of the United States.

To most of us "home missions" has to do with the frontier, but modern "Home Missions" as these men are tackling the job, is no longer a question of geography, it is a matter of problems, no matter where they may be found; and so, while these agencies are still tremendously concerned about the Indian and the Alaskan, the Spanish-American and the Mountain-white, they are studying scientifically the question of the immigrant, the problem of the slum and the tenement, of women and children in industry, the saloon and temperance reform, the loss of population in the rural districts, the rush of the people to the city, the social movements among the masses, and not the least of the questions that they are working out is how the Church may advance with a unified program so as to do away with overlapping and competition, so that the entire work may be done with the least difficulty.

For years the evangelists of the Church have been telling us that the world is ready for another great revival. They have been prophesying that soon we shall see a "great awakening." But these prophets have seen only a part of the future glory of the Church. In this awakening there will be much of the so-called "evangelistic" preaching, but great emphasis will be placed upon the social gospel for which the Church has been so long preparing. This gospel will have to do not so much with a spectacular philanthropy, which is supposed to express the kindness of the well-favored toward the poor, but it will also demand justice and right dealing toward all men. It will deal fearlessly with the question of the exploitation of little children, of helpless women, and of down-trodden men. It will demand that men's bodies shall be saved as well as their souls. It will not say less about heaven and its glory, but it will say more about earth and its duty. It will seek to convert men socially as well as spiritually. It will destroy forever that miserably false conception that a Christian man may practice unchristian principles in his business life simply because his unchristian competitors find it more profitable to do so. It will insist that every community composed of Christian people must also be a Christian community.

The future victories of the Church will be won largely because of its cooperation with the men who in other fields and through other methods have been largely laboring in the spirit of Jesus to reach the same goal toward which the Church has been struggling. Not always known as Christians, and sometimes spurned by those who thought that they had a monopoly of the Christian religion, nevertheless they have been controlled by the spirit of Jesus, which, after all, is the truest test of genuine Christianity. Already these men and women have won victories of which the Church might well be proud.

Dimly the best leaders of the modern social movement realize that theirs is a religious movement. They are sometimes puzzled and oftimes distressed because they cannot harmonize their terminology with that of the Church, but they are conscious that somewhere there must be a nexus. Leaders in the Church the world over are convinced that the Church must soon become the leader in a new social propaganda. They are unwilling that the Church should surrender to the unscrupulous agitator the place which it has made for itself in the social and the economic world because of its teachings throughout many generations. With deep concern they are searching for the rock foundation upon which they may build a far-reaching social program for the Church.

Some day the leaders in both the Church and the social movement will see their way as clear as the sun. That day will witness the coming of "the times of refreshing"—the long expected revival will be at hand, and the Church of Christ will enter upon the completion of the task which it so long ago began, and upon which it has long been laboring, even though sometimes it saw only "as through a glass darkly."

The Conviction of Lieutenant Becker

The recent conviction of Lieut. Becker of the police force of New York for sending assassins to murder a gambler who was about to give testimony with regard to conditions in the underworld, has astonished the whole country. The corruption in the police force of various cities has been hinted at but there has scarcely ever been a case so flagrantly wicked as this. When the very agents of justice become hired assassins, the life of no citizen is safe against the interests.

It is more than a suspicion that the police in other cities of the country are partners of the brothel, the gambling hell and even of gangs of burglars and other criminals. This situation is only paralleled by the usurpations of the Praetorian guards in the time of the decadence of Rome. The police force maintains a powerful secret society and it is only with the greatest difficulty that any information can be secured.

Doubtless the remedy that has been taken in New York of making a summary example of an officer is a good one. We no longer find ourselves believing in capital punishment but if it is anywhere appropriate, it is fit for the man who is the sworn guardian of the people and who betrays his trust.

The Vice Investigation in Chicago

The city council of Chicago under the administration of Mayor Harrison has been undertaking to live as though ignorant of the report of the vice commission appointed by Mayor Busse. The explosion has come, however, and the state's attorney has put all the red light resorters on the run. The city council at this date now begins to give some attention to the question.

Their first action is to appoint a committee of aldermen to investigate. This committee will endeavor to ascertain whether the action of the state's attorney has scattered vice in Chicago. If so, this fact will be considered a good argument for the policy of segregation. At the same time our state law provides for nothing but to keep vice on the run. To permit segregation is for the mayor and city councils to be as much law-breakers as the red-light resorters themselves.

Meanwhile the churches of the city are realizing their opportunity and are giving expression to their sentiment in no uncertain way. The ministers visited the council chambers to attend a committee meeting not long since and every minister's association in the city, of the larger bodies, has spoken in no uncertain tone. All this shows that the world has moved up in five years. Only half a decade ago, some of the most orthodox ministers in Chicago could be counted on the side of segregation.

The Balkan States

A great many people are learning for the first time of nations that nestle in the Balkan mountains and which for a long time have been out of the big currents of the world's life. Servia, Bulgaria and Montenegro are now waging war on Turkey. It now seems that the "sick man" of Europe is to meet his demise through other doctors than Russia or Germany.

These little states are Slavic and all have much the same origin. Servia was once a nation of sufficient importance to have aspired to the conquest of the Eastern Roman empire. For five centuries they have borne the treatment of the Turk and have resisted the advantages of apostasy to the Mohammedan faith. The hour for which they have waited has struck.

Those who are continually prophesying war between the great European powers find in this situation great danger. Austria wishes to impose a compromise, at the moment of victory, upon the successful allies. This is doubtless inspired by the bankers who hold Turkish securities.

The Turk has long hindered civilization. He has brought reproach upon the Mohammedan religion and brought out in high relief the worst elements in that faith. He has massacred Christians. Even the citizens of Turkey have grown steadily poorer under the miserable misgovernment of the Sultan. This is shown by the fact that Turkish people are starving thus early in the year.

No action of the powers can make an unfit nation survive long. The Turk has sinned against light and he must cross the Hellespont into Asia.

The Lessons of the Election

The lessons of the recent election are differently interpreted. On the face of the returns there seems to be a democratic landslide but closer examination reveals that the democratic popular vote is only 42 per cent of the total. The Republican party split evenly enough to make the enormous total of electoral votes for Wilson.

Never in the history of the country has a president stood for re-election and been defeated by such a vote. President Taft secured only about 25 per cent of the total popular vote. This is certainly not due to such conspicuous failure on his part, but is rather due to the offences which some of his supporters had committed against the people. It is significant that almost to a man the old stand-pat guard that has controlled legislation so long has been retired from public life.

The Progressives have done what has never been accomplished before in American politics. In three months time they have organized a party which has come to be the second numerically in the country. Those who have regarded this movement contemptuously as a "split" must surely realize by this time that the party is a serious effort to realize the results of our modern social study in legislation. The party is no hero-worshipping excitement, and no spite movement. The Progressive platform has been built into American politics to stay.

Meanwhile the country is to be congratulated on having secured so good a President as Governor Wilson. He is new and in a sense untried in our national affairs, but there is much to say for him. He is the first President to have a Ph. D. from a prominent university. He has so far been found consistently on the side of democracy. In his party organization, however, are to be found stand-patters as dangerous to progress as any to be found in the old Republican organization. The task of living with such men as Sullivan and Murphy is not easier than that of living with Cannon and Aldrich.

Democratic office-holders have waited sixteen years for this day. They are very hungry. It will be a wonder if the democratic organization endures their demands without a split.

The Bible in the Public Schools

No question is ever settled until it is settled right, and the place of the Bible in public education is one of these. In some states the machinations of priests, in others a lawsuit instituted by some blatant free-thinker, have resulted in throwing the Bible out of the public school. Thus the Bible is given a unique place in that it is the one book that is specifically forbidden in the training of children in certain states. In these states, the rights of the vast majority have been trodden under foot to keep a certain noisy minority silent. By this action the public school is forbidden to use that literature which is the mother of our Anglo-Saxon literature as well as our Anglo-Saxon institutions. An educational system like this is under the domination of a dogmatism worse than any acclesiastical dogmatism.

Once the Bible was our school reader. In such days, men grew up to be masters of style, as well as geniuses in thought. In such days we had Whittier, Longfellow and Lowell. We had statesmen like Jefferson and Hamilton. Nowadays there has been substituted for this masterful literature, various forms of twaddle that has neither style nor greatness of thought. Along with the Bible time has thrown out much of the great English literature that once adorned our school readers. Under such a system, we shall have a literary style a la Hearst and have such profundity of thought as comes from Mr. Dooley.

The state that hangs eighteen year-old boys for not doing right and yet never taught these boys what right was, is itself a criminal. The increase of juvenile delinquency and of juvenile crimes such as those of the car-barn bandits, is some little warning of what we may expect from a system of education which is speechless when it comes to definite instruction in ethics and the greater religious sanctions. The church handed education over to the state that learning might be free. Shall we now have a silence more damning than silence on new truth in biology and history?

—The Billings (Montana) Polytechnic Institute is organized as a state. The citizens (i.e., pupils) make and enforce all laws through their representatives and elective officers.

Woman's Work For Christ

One view of woman's work is implied in a remark made by Mutesa, king of Uganda to a visitor who had inquired about the wealth of the country: "Our riches lie in ivory and women and cattle and slaves and houses." According to this view it is woman's business to observe the will and pleasure of man, her master. She has no more right to freedom than an ox.

"Those who read diligently and impartially Sanscrit literature in the original," says Ramabai, "cannot fail to recognize the lawgiver, Manu, as one of those hundreds who have done their best to make woman a hateful being in the world's eye. To employ her in housekeeping and kindred occupations is thought to be the only means of keeping her out of mischief, the blessed enjoyment of literary culture being denied her. She is forbidden to read the sacred scriptures. She has no right to pronounce a single word out of them. To appease her uncultivated, low kind of desire by giving her ornaments to adorn her person, and by giving her dainty food with an occasional bow which costs nothing, are the highest honors to which a Hindu woman is entitled. She, the loving mother of the nation, the devoted wife, the tender sister and affectionate daughter is never fit for independence, and is as impure as falsehood itself! She is never to be trusted, matters of importance are never to be committed to her."

The statement of the apostle that in Christ there is neither male nor female is still accepted with mental reservation by many who consider themselves enlightened. The other day a man whom I know went to an agent to rent a house. He took his wife along but at no time did he consult her about the house. He seemed to think that she ought to live in any house he might be willing to provide. It does not occur to him, if one may judge from his conduct, that his wife has any opinions that he is bound to respect. The proper place for this man is among savages. In an age of brute force woman was the slave of man. The statement of a Paul can be understood only in an age of enlightenment. When people examine their customs to see whether they are just or unjust and have more respect for persons than they have for forms and customs, they discover that women have been badly treated and that the progress of the race depends upon giving her a fair chance.

When the government of the United States made the discovery that it had obligations to the children it called a woman to lead its activities in behalf of the children. The place of woman in the church is assured. Her interpretation in word and deed of the life of Christ is necessary to the highest usefulness of the church. Her first service to the church begins in the home. The good and gentle Pestalozzi says, "The best way for a child to learn to fear God is to see and hear a real Christian. We must love men, trust them, before we can rise to loving, thanking, trusting, and obeying God. How do these sentiments take root in the heart? I find that it is principally through the relations which exist between a mother and her child." The home is the child's first temple.

Woman is finding that she cannot do her full duty to the home unless she goes outside of it to work. Her child goes to the school. What are the conditions of its life there? What sort of teachers are provided for it? Woman demands the right to assist in managing the schools. On the streets there are temptations for the young. There are conditions that menace the health of the people. Women are coming to see that it is their business to have a voice in deciding what shall be dome to remove temptation and to combat disease. Whatever pertains to the physical and moral health of the human race is of interest to women. They have learned that Christian service is not limited to one department of life, that recreation, education, politics, sanitation, pure food, and commercial honesty must be familiar terms to all who would fulfil their duty as disciples of Jesus.

The missionary service of woman is conspicuous. She has felt the force of the appeal of ignorance and helplessness. She has organized missionary societies and she has helped to support the societies organized by men. She has done her share of the work at home and abroad. The amount of money contributed by women to missions is large. They are interested in all phases of missions, in evangelization, education, industrial training, and the ministry of the physician. They are raising the standards of efficiency for their missionaries. They face the future with confidence. [Midweek Service. Nov. 27. Matt. 26:6-13; Lu. 21:1-4; Acts 9:36-43; Rom. 16:1-15. The Strategic Place of Home Missions

Will some Gibbon of the twenty-fifth century write the "Rise and Fall of the American Republic?" That depends upon what takes place in the present generation. What the Christian forces of our country do in the next few decades will determine the course of history for the next five centuries, and perhaps forever.

Our nation is at the cross-roads. The choice must be made. Just as the greatest American once said that this country could not remain half slave and half free, so with equal truth it may be affirmed that the United States cannot remain half Christian and half pagan. Which shall it be, the cross illumined tower or the placard of the Lawrence rioters, "No God, No Master?"

The task before the Christian churches of America could hardly be more stupendous than it is. A generation ago home missions meant to the average church member putting a seedy prince-albert into a box, full of other discarded garments, for an itinerant preacher who often had more children than sermons in his quiver. God bless him and every other pioneer who lifts up Christ's cross in the wilderness! But today home missions has a significance a thousandfold deeper. Our frontiers have been pushed on and on until they have touched the barrier of the western sea, but the sea is not a barrier; it is a means of communication, a broad highway, a level plain across which hordes of human kind may rush and pour themselves into the nation's "Melting Pot." The frontier is no longer the barren waste and primeval forest. The real frontiers of our nation are its great cities; its New Yorks, its Chicagos, its Omahas, its San Franciscos.

Not only is the entire task stupendous, but each aspect of it seems to constitute a separate problem equally stupendous. Our 10,000,000 Negroes, not yet two generations out of slavery; our 5,000,000 lowland whites and southern mountaineers; our Indian dependents; our oriental population, Chinese, Japanese, and Hindu, on the Pacific Coast; our Spanish-American wards in Cuba and Porto Rico; our rapidly increasing Slavic population both on the farms and in our great cities; these disclose the diverse racial features of America's mighty problem. But this is only one side of it. Men bring with them not only strong hands to toil, but ideas and often ideals. They come to us with their old-world medievalism, with cramped distorted notions of authority and liberty, with all that is alien to our noble inheritance of puritanism in morals and freedom in the things of the spirit. Here is where the real battle is to be waged; not with the peaceful, but yet ready, weapons of competition in industry, but with standards of living, principles of conduct, ideals of individual, family, and social righteousness. No mightier conflict was ever waged in the history of nations than this in which we are now engaged. It is the real Gettysburg of our nation, and the battlefield is from coast to coast and from palm to pine.

Perhaps the most stupendous part of our problem is its social and industrial side. Travelers come back from abroad congratulating themselves that dire and widespread poverty as seen in Liverpool or London does not exist in America. Hitherto, we have escaped because land has been so plentiful. Thomas Carlyle once said: "Ye may boast o' yer democracy or any ither 'cracy or any kind o' poleetical roobish, but the reason why yer laboring folk are so happy is that ye have a vost deal o' land for a verra few people." But that day has gone by. There is practically no free land left. We have given away some of the finest sections of our national domain to the railroads and other less respectable land-grabbers. Rents for the workingman in our big cities are on the increase. More farmers than ever are renting and not owning farms. We face a new era of social and economic unrest unlike anything we have hitherto experienced. Still another serious factor in our American problem is the approach of the completion of the Panama Canal and the consequent commercial development of the Pacific Coast, which will bring to the states on our western seaboard a tidal wave of European immigrants, who can then reach the Golden Gate almost as cheaply as they now come to New York.

Who is sufficient for this herculean task? It demands nothing less than the united strength of a coöperative Protestantism, banded together to face a common enemy. It needs the sort of men of whom Russell Lowell spoke, "men with empires in their brains;" men like Cecil Rhodes, whose vision can take in the vast sweep of our diverse problems, and out of confusion and chaos create a Christian empire of order and righteousness.

We must, therefore, think in bigger terms than the American Missionary Society and the number of missionaries it employs, or even the Home Missions Council, representing the unified efforts of our Protestant denominations. The great problems and policies which the united Protestant church has been studying the last three months ought to impress upon every man and woman of every church of every evangelical denomination in this country the supreme importance of saving our nation for the kingdom of God through the established agencies of the church. The culmination of this campaign of publicity and education is this Home Mission Week, Nov. 17-24. Will it result in an awakened church, an intelligent church, an enthusiastic church? If so, then we shall have a contributing church, and it may be that the Gibbon of the twenty-fifth century will give to his history of America a very different title from that of the historian of the Roman Empire.

Skin-deep Religion

An old adage has it that "Beauty is only skin-deep." Like many another ancient saw, this is only a half-truth, for beauty of the human being depends not only upon outward fairness but upon qualities of character. The most lovely face may become unlovely and repellent when the soul is swept by anger or filled with unworthy impulses and desires. And yet the half-truth is an important one, warning us as it does against valuing too highly perfection of form and coloring. When one stops to consider carefully the religious life of his time, to note the indifference toward God and his work in this world which characterizes so many professed followers of Jesus Christ, considers the content in which so many live who give no sign of interest in the work of the kingdom except on Sundays, one is tempted to believe that, with multitudes of people, religion is only skin-deep. At all events, we may not deny that for great numbers of people religion is not taken seriously, does not shape their thinking, choices, and activities. They are not consciously living religious lives any considerable portion of the time. They are religious, or fancy themselves so, when engaged in religious exercises; at other times, in the routine of daily living, religion finds no place.

Doubtless not a few people are in fundamental error as to that which religion really is. They conceive it to be a confession, a form, a ceremony, a posture, or any one or all of a large number of outward things. Outward things may be religious, but they cannot be religion. We may have religious ceremonies and religious symbols, but these do not constitute religion. The fact that life must express itself in visible forms, and that religion is life, no one will deny. Neither may we doubt the possibility of detaching the outward form from the inward life, leaving only a comparatively valueless symbol. The history of religion is full of illustrations of such detachment. When the life of the spirit has died out the ritual through which the spirit once revealed itself has been cherished and given emphasis as something that has inherent worth. Every period of decadence and marked weakness in organized Christianity may be traced directly to such decay of the life of the spirit, and at such times Christianity stands out like a dead and leafless tree; the outward form is there, but the vitality has long since departed.

Religion is of the soul. We may not justly predicate it of anything else. When the human spirit is in a right attitude toward God and man, there is religion, and nowhere else. Out of this spiritual attitude activities are born. Even when we have practically forgotten God and have come to ignore our fellowmen and their welfare, those activities may persist in a greater or less degree, but they do not constitute religion. The power of habit often leads people to continue exercises which once were the expression of reality but now are simply mechanical motions. The most difficult task which the Christian has to perform is to keep his heart; the easiest is the observance of established forms and ceremonies. To bow the head, to take upon the lips words of prayer, to observe established ordinances of the church, calls for no such self-mastery as is involved in returning good for evil or loving our enemy.

Religion is essentially of the common life. While it is found revealing itself, and necessarily so, in associated worship and through the varied outward forms by which the soul makes its longings and purposes known to others, it is in the daily relations with our fellowmen, hour by hour and moment by moment, that religion exercises its highest function and rises to its highest value. The real tests of religion are applied when we ask ourselves, "In how far am I striving to live all the time in conscious companionship with God? Do I undertake to carry out his will in all the affairs of daily life?" These questions reach down underneath visible forms and touch underlying realities.

Few people are consciously hypocrites. The rank and file of those who make up church life are not acting a part. But while this is true, it must be admitted that many of us are too easily satisfied as regards our relations to God. If we have made public confession of Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour, have related ourselves to organized Christianity, and now hold ourselves to a fair degree of faithfulness in attendance upon public worship, we are prone to assume that we have discharged our whole duty. Such assumption should be tested in the presence of Jesus Christ. It is the Christian's privilege and duty to live His life over again in so far as our poor human nature makes it possible. The reproduction in ourselves of the life of Jesus means constant fellowship with him and with our Heavenly Father, unfailing interest in all that concerns the welfare of our fellowmen, and a love constantly revealing itself through unselfish ministry. Without this, religion is only of the surface and is unworthy of the name.

Questions

A reader sends the following questions:

Did the General Convention at Louisville decree that Mr. Sarvis should baptize his converts abroad or be recalled?

We know of no such action taken at the Louisville convention, If, however, Mr. Sarvis should be so neglectful of an essential part of his work as a Christian missionary as to fail to baptize his converts The Christian Century, for one, would vote emphatically for his recall.

Did not the convention at different times ask men to its fellowship and to instruct it who had not been baptized?

We know of none. Certainly all of the Disciples speaking were baptized believers. Such men as Dr. J. E. Williams, Presbyterian missionary in China and Bishop Boyd Vincent of the Episcopal church have surely been baptized.

Is it not more honorable and noble to relinquish all claims to being a member of the Disciple brotherhood when one is not in harmony with it than to hang on and claim to be a member when it is clear he is not in harmony?

Yes, decidedly.

—The Anti-Saloon League finds great satisfaction over the outcome of the election in Illinois notwithstanding the defeat of Gov. Deneen whom the League recommended. The legislature, it seems will be in the control of the Anti-saloon forces. Fifteen legislators from Cook County and 62 or possibly 65 from down state are pledged to support local option legislation. Seventy-seven is the number required to control. It is probable that the local option vote will be larger, too, than the number pledged in advance. This is a gain of from fourteen to seventeen votes over the last assembly. It is believed that Gov.-elect Dunne will not veto local option legislation if it is put up to him Standing as he does for the referendum principle it is assumed that he cannot consistently violate it when applied to the liquor traffic The League reports that in the campaign just closed the churches and ministers of Chicago and the entire state manifested greater loyalty and zeal in the cause than in any previous campaign

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly.

Outward Bound

It was approaching noon on Friday, Sept. 27, when we reached the docks of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, the Oriental Steamship Company. There lay the Tenyo Maru, one of the triple screw turbine steamers of that line, ready to start at one o'clock. After we were sure that the baggage had all come down, and had given the proper steward the numbers of the staterooms to which the cabin luggage was to be taken, we went on board and had a look at the rooms.

To travelers on the Atlantic the modern luxury of ocean journeys is no novelty. But one is hardly prepared to find the Pacific steamers so large and comfortable. These boats will not compare, of course, with the crack liners like the Lusitania or the Olympic, either in size or appointments. The Tenyo Maru is 575 feet in length, with 14,000 tons register and 21,000 tons displacement. There are accommodations for 275 first cabin passengers, 54 second cabin, and 800 steerage. The average speed is about 15 knots, though it has a capacity of nearly 20.

Adequate Comforts.

But the satisfactions offered by the cabins, decks and dining saloon are alll that could be wished. The staterooms are large enough to give a sense of spaciousness which is a keen delight on a long voyage. Their perfect ventilation is made certain by open ports and electric fans in every room. There are electric lights overhead and at the head of each of the berths for night reading. Then there are clothes cabinets, a desk, and the usual couch and chiffonier features, making as large and comfortable quarters as could be desired.

There are six decks, providing ample promenade room for all on board, and in addition sufficient space for such games as shuffleboard, indoor baseball, and the score of diversions which a company of sea travelers is sure to devise. The dining-room is a large and handsome room, and there is a recreation room, a ladies' drawing room and a smoking room, all of which are models of convenience and taste.

We did not have time to see all of this at once, however, for several friends had come down to the ship to see us away, there were letters and telegrams to read, and a profusion of flowers, which we hoped, by care, to be able to keep for many days. Then there is always a certain curiosity to know who one's fellow travelers are to be. Of some we had known before. Among several young men who were going out to China, Japan or Korea for mission work we found Dr. C. Siler, a Disciple, recently connected with the Y. M. C. A. in Chicago. He is to be physical director of the association work in Tein-tsin. Also Mr. and Mrs. L. E. McLachlan, or Foo Chow, who have been home for a year, are returning to their work in charge of the Y. M. C. A. in that important Chinese city. They are also Disciples, and one regrets that such valuable young people might not have taken work under our own Foreign Board, as President McLean desired them to do. Mrs. McLachlan is a daughter of O. H. Phillips, of Pittsburg.

A Japanese Ship.

Others of the company will become known as we go on, but now the warning gong is sounding, and all who are not to go are sent ashore. The last farewells are spoken by those who go and those who stay. The big whistle gives the final signal, the cables are slipped from their holdings, and inch by inch the big liner drifts back from the dock. Then the engines begin their movement that is not to cease for days to come, and we are off.

The crowd on the dock followed slowly along the side of the ship to the end of the pier. When we looked at the many faces uplifted in "good byes" we had a surprised appreciation of the fact that it was a Japanese ship, and that a large proportion of those who went with us, as crew and as passengers, were of the same race. Really we had never known that there were so many Japanese alive! They formed a dense mass of dark faced and eager witnesses of the ship's departure.

It was formerly the commonplace of ocean travel that when you felt yourself loosed from the dock on a voyage you were out of reach of all your fellow beings, and had put all the world under bonds to keep hands off you for at least a week. But it is no longer so. Though we had soon slipped out of the Golden Gate, and were upon the high seas, it was only necessary to climb to the storm deck to hear the incessant crack of the wireless flashes, and know that we were almost as much in the busy world as ever. Wireless messages were received and sent by some on board, and when we took our places at the table for dinner at seven, we had the first of our daily "Tenyo Maru Wireless Telegrams" placed on our plates, with its summary of the day's news, from the report of the Senate inquiry into campaign contributions to the score of the San Francisco-Oakland baseball game!

A Superstition Defied.

If anyone supposes that the old supersition regarding Friday as unlucky has any significance longer, he should be reminded that only once on this voyage has anybody spoken of the day of the regular sailing of the ships of this line as unlucky. Perhaps the Japanese have too much sense to be troubled by a superstition which shuts away one day in the week from successful use in the beginning of any enterprise. Or perhaps they never heard of the belief. At any rate, they are clever enough to have found it out, if the evil influence of the day had really existed.

By Saturday morning the staterooms were arranged, the books unpacked, the schedule of studies for our class arranged, and everyone settled down to the comfort, rest and work of the long voyage. The weather was ideal. The sea was smooth and beautiful. Almost no ships were in sight, and with the exception of two or three whales on the second day, and a school of flying fish now and then, no life of any sort has been in evidence over the broad stretches of the Pacific.

Variety of Diversions.

But there has been plenty of life on the Tenyo. Tramping around the big decks is a constant pastime. In the afternoons they put a net around the upper deck and have a game of indoor baseball. There is a swimming tank just forward of the promenade deck, which if not large enough for long distance swimming, is very convenient for diving, and is freely used by both ladies and gentlemen. The Y. M. C. A. and college boys has plenty of plans to keep the rest busy in athletic stunts of one sort and another. And in the evenings we have all sorts of recreation fitted to the taste of the variety of people on board, from bridge whist and dancing to concerts and moving picture shows.

And so we pass the days, and we look forward to the only break in our voyage, when after five days of travel to the southwest we shall come in sight of the Hawaiian Islands, and anchor, or tie up, for a day's stop, in the harbor of Honolulu.

At sea, September 30.

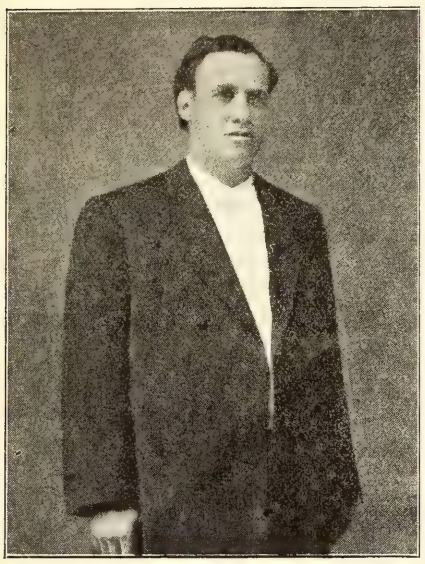
—The Lord's Prayer, which is a summary of the teachings of Jesus as well as a formula of worship, gives most striking expression to this fact as a fundamental truth, that forgiveness is an attribute of both God and man. The Old Testament comes nearest to the Christian teaching on just this point. It is full of the forgiving nature of Jehovah. And when any Christian realizes how much he daily needs to be judged by the forgiving God, forgiveness will become easy to practice. More and more we shall come to understand God's patience with our sins and errors and for His sake be ready to forgive.— Congregationalist and Christian World.

—To be eager to give pity to men and forgiveness to their wrong; to desire with thirst to bind up the broken heart of men, and to realize our desire in act—this is to thirst for God as Love.— Stopford Brooke.

Interpretations

Columbus Tabernacle Sermons

While at the Louisville convention that stalwart minister of Indiana, William Henry Book, presented me with a copy of his "Columbus Tabernacle Sermons." I promised him that I would review the book, and, as is the custom of some preachers, I shall endeavor to keep my promise.



Rev. W. H. Book.

Under his name, which he inscribed on the fly leaf of my volume, the author wrote: "Be good, keep sweet and stay in the middle of the road." I do not know how studied those words were; but no words could better express the spirit of the volume. There is in every sermon a rugged moral demand which says, "Be good." In several of the sermons and especially in the one entitled "Brotherly Love" there is a sympathy and tenderness which say: "Keep sweet." And in every sermon there is controversy and exhortation which say, "Stay in the middle of the road."

Two characteristics of Mr. Book's semons are very prominent, the controversial and the anecdotal. The author's early ministry, his ministry in those years when he was forming his style and shaping his message, must have been in pioneer communities in which religious questions were discussed with some heat and more in their creedal than their personal aspects. Even in his sermon on "The Communion" the first sentence deals with a controverted point. Mr. Book seems always to have in mind an opponent when preaching; and the opponent one who holds a false doctrine.

There is a certain strength in this trait. The author is never in doubt, and never leaves his readers wondering as to his position. However, his method of settling great mooted questions would not be conclusive or convincing to many.

The author-preacher is apt in illustration. There is the ring of a genuine and sincere soul in these. Most of them are gleaned from his own experiences, but some are stock illustrations of our doctrinal propaganda.

There are a few strained-for fantastic interpretations of Scripture—such are found in his sermon "The Ark, a Type of the Church." For instance, Noah, the author tells us, was to make the ark out of gopher wood—one wood—to signify the unity of the church.

I heard this sermon preached by the author, and despite its strained interpretations it carried a quickening religious message—because the soul of the minister as well as his words—more than his words—is the sermon. The author is a red veined preacher who surely ministers helpfully to the souls of men.

If he writes other volumes they will contain richer, deeper notes. There is scarcely a sigh in this book. There will be in later ones. This growth the author has already noted in his own soul. He says in one place, "Unity is in the air; it is coming. We cannot force it. When I began to preach I imagined they were all going to join us, and I proceeded to make my pulpit a dissecting table and at once cut and carved everything I did not endorse. I could stir up more trouble in one sermon than ten preachers could remedy in twelve months."

He then proceeds to say that union will come about by God's love shining through all our hearts, melting away all differences.

These sermons are mostly on what have been called first principles. Such subjects as "The Scheme of Redemption;" "The New Birth," and "What Must I do to be Saved?" are considered. There are in all fourteen sermons. The position of the author is well stated in these lines found in his sermon on brotherly love: "I borrow my sermons from such men as Paul, Peter, John and Jesus Christ. Then if I should say something that is calculated to hurt the feelings of those that hear, and they become offended, I simply dodge behind these men, and say: You must ask them to apologize, not me; I am not responsible; I have only given you what they say."

I conclude that Brother Book lives up to his own motto: "Be good, keep sweet, and stay in the middle of the road." If his lot be ever cast in a moral wilderness, where there is no middle of the road for the reason that there is no road,—and every community is more or less such,—I believe he would valiantly swing the axe and be a pioneer for a better day. Every true man would do that, and W. H. Book is true.

Weaknesses of Present-Day Evangelism

An Address Delivered Before the Evangelistic Conference in Chicago.

BY FREDERICK E. TAYLOR.

I am going to suggest some of the things which I think, and which others have told me they have thought, ought to be mentioned in connection with evangelism and evangelists. First, let me speak concerning the evangelist himself. I find, generally speaking, a woeful lack of real, deep, spiritual life on the part of some evangelists. They preach as though they had it, but when you get on the inside of their daily life you find out that they talk about something that is not real to themselves. This is due to a lack of daily devotional Bible study and prayer. Becoming so immersed in the work they neglect this most important matter. Our Saviour got very tired, but how many times do we find that he arose before day and went out into the mountain to pray! This must be done even if men give up more of their meetings.

Superficiality.

Another lack is that of reading, and the evangelist becomes superficial. I mean by that, that he ought, as a preacher, to know the current books on theology, and what pertains to his work. How many men have we heard criticise the higher criticism—get the applause of an audience for criticising the higher criticism. Ask some of those men, "Have you ever read a book on the higher criticism or the lower criticism and which do you think is the more dangerous of the two?" I am much more afraid of lower criticism than higher criticism. Do not think I am defending higher criticism, I am not, although I believe that there are some good things in higher criticism, and there are some men who have accepted some of the theories of the conservative critics who are just as evangelistic as we claim to be.

Exaggeration of Results.

One other thing that needs to be emphasized earnestly, is the exaggeration of results in evangelistic meetings. Some time ago a well-known evangelist came to a certain city. The church which engaged him was not large enough to hold the people. They engaged a large building and that building was crowded night after night. Every night they had converts, and they had a blackboard out on the corner stating how many converts they had, and that continued until it got up in the neighborhood of between 600 and 700 reported converts. I never went by that board but that I got cross about it. How did that man know how many converts he had? What do we know about a conversion?

One of the wealthiest men in that church and one of the most spiritually-minded men in the city, a man who is in hearty sympathy with good evangelism, said to me afterwards, "I am not saying anything in the church, but do you know we reported nearly 700 converts, and our church does not seat over 600 people. Suppose half of them came—our church would not hold them. It looks rather strange that we should have over 600 converts, and I could not tell you how many you could find today. There is something wrong with that kind of evangelism and I do not want any more of it." I agreed with him. Almost always the evangelist is counting all who sign cards, including the children, and it is an easy thing to get a lot of children to sign a card, and do whatever the speaker asks them. I attended a men's meeting when a certain evangelist spoke to 3,000 men, and gave a splendid sermon. He scored men mercilessly for their sins and he then gave the invitation; then he said, "Every man who wants to be a better man and live up to what I have been trying to preach, stand up," and every last man in the house got up. That is not being converted; that is not coming to Christ; that is not repentance. Then that evangelist cried out at the top of his voice, "Three thousand men for God." Was that telling the truth? I asked a lawyer who was there and who was a drinking man, what he thought of the meeting, and he said it was "a bully good show." He went right out of that meeting and got a drink. I have sat right on the platform with an evangelist and I heard him say, "There's one," "And another," "And another," and my eyes went over the audience and there were only one or two. I have seen that thing more than once and I have said to myself, "That is not right. That is not being true."

Insincerity in Preaching.

One other weakness is insincere preaching—preaching that is shallow and superficial, and full of death-bed stories. Now do not misunderstand me, I do not hesitate to tell a story concerning the death of some one if it is true, and will help men to realize the need of a Saviour, but I know one man who will work his face into all sorts of contortions until he gets the tears coming, and the audience thinks he is greatly affected. When you think of such men as Wesley and Finney and Moody and Whitefield, you know they were not actors. You all know the story of the little child whose father was a preacher. When this little girl heard her father tell a story that nearly broke her heart, she said, "Say, father, was that story true, or was it just preaching?" There are too many stories going around that are just preaching—they are not real.

Methods of Publicity.

I wish we could inveigh against the constant posing for photographs. Men are taken in this posture and that posture, and all sorts of postures; the picture of the evangelist getting on the train and getting off the train, and taking off his hat. Does it not make you think a first class show is coming to town? There are some men who are splendid publicity agents for an evangelist. There is something wrong about that to the average business man. Take fifty or sixty representative men of the business world. Let us ask them, "What do you think about that?" And they would be absolutely unanimous against that sort of thing. Now some of us who are in the pastorate know how evangelism is criticized. It is all wrong that we should have to stand so much criticism.

Remuneration.

Another weakness must be mentioned, and that is the method of remuneration. I am in sympathy with evangelism, but it is hard to defend some things. I was at a social affair the other night and I met a gentleman from out of town and he told me where he lived. I said, "I know some people where you live." He asked, "Do you know so and so, and so and so? They are evangelists. They have made a lot of money in it; they are rich." He did not say how marvelously God was using them. There is considerable criticism about certain evangelists driving around in high power automobiles.

When I went into evangelism, I was introduced to a man who put his loving arm around me and said, "Brother Taylor, I am going to pray for you every day," and that was Major Cole. It was a benediction to my soul. The next day I was walking with a celebrated evangelist, and he said, "You are going into the evangelistic field. I live right over there, you come over to my house and I will tell you how to get an offering, I have got them skinned a mile in getting an offering." I was incensed, for I thought the paramount thought in that man's mind was the securing of an offering. In politics they call that grafting, and that is all it is. We will have to be delivered of that thing somehow, and the church is the agent to handle the matter. Did you ever hear of such a thing as the finger of scorn being pointed at Mr. Moody along the line of finance? In London they offered Mr. Moody $2,000 or $3,000 after months of work, and he handed back half of it and said, "I am not entitled to it." Not many modern evangelists would do that.

Prayer in Evangelism.

I do not know what will quicken the church of Christ if it is not evangelism, but we must have the right kind of evangelism, not less evangelism but more evangelism and a better kind of evangelism. In the city of Rochester, N. Y., a friend said to me, "Do you know the business men in this town are the cleanest, whitest men I have ever known. I do not mean to say that this town is all that it ought to be but the business men are a high class of men. Do you know where it all comes from? We can trace it back to Charles G. Finney's work. He left an impression upon this part of the country that will last a hundred years to come." That is the kind of evangelism we want, an evangelism that begins in prayer, continues in prayer and ends in prayer. There is a worldliness in evangelism of today that is all wrong.

The Church in the County

The Open and Neglected Opportunity of Neighborhood Organization

By E. F. Daugherty

We do well to have the clear fact in mind that, on every convention occasion, we are assembled as stewards of of the manifold grace of God revealed in the gospel of His Son; assembled for rejoicing and thanksgiving in providential blessings and care,—and to lay plans for the Kingdom's advance, plans for more honor to the Name which is above every name.

Befitting it then is, to weigh words from life's Master which call for face to face fronting with conditions as they are in life—conditions out of which must be wrought triumphs for our King. Such words of His are these—'the sons of this world are for their own generation wiser than the children of the light'—'Children of the light' being such as we, who profess to hold first in our philosophy and practice, the kingdom of God's righteousness. The' sons of this world' are the hosts engrossed with the world's affairs.

Present Human Welfare.

The aim of all the affairs with which the sons of this world' are prepossessed is—present human welfare. In these affairs the great desire is utility; the dominant method is expediency; the ruling passion is efficiency; and their horizon is limited by the life which now is. To exploit, promote, conserve and perfect the affairs of present human welfare, the sons of this world' are in action, affording demonstrations of their wisdom before our eyes on every hand. I initially challenge your thought of that wisdom, that I may apply its logic to the problems confronting the church in the county.'

Take the matter of health: It is fundamentally consequential in relation to every individual and community. Boards of health, for the most part on the county basis the land over, nip the rising epidemic in its bud, guard the streams of the land, preach the good gospel of sanitation and hygiene and largely baffle or confuse the imps of disease on their every uprising.

Then the thing of economics: Government to be supported; public institutions maintained; civic interest safeguarded. Matters, in relation to which every citizen is a steward of realty, or personal property, or the right of franchise; as such he travels with all others the path to the county treasurer's office and pays taxes that economic efficiency may be had; and the larger part of it is on the county basis.

There is the matter of education: Basal in a land like ours, where the general intelligence of the people measures their welfare in every respect; so, the county superintendant of schools, with his forces and resources, serves on the county basis,—and with an untrameled school system, liberty abides the land throughout.

Our Marvelous Commercialism.

Here is the thing of a marvelous commercialism: Resourceful firms innumerable, putting out myriads of articles in trade; and, whether autos, soap or safety-pins, the commercial firms have care that their special output reaches all the people, territorially distributing by counties.

Here is the law in its majesty: For its interpretation, the county judge sits on his bench; for its execution the prosecuting attorney and sheriff fulfill their duties—and the maintenance of public order is had within the county limits.

Here are widespread surges of moral reform: Whether in the interests of temperance advance, or law enforcement, the forward steps and splendid victories of the last few years have been on the county basis.

Supremely, here's the game of practical politics: In days now passing, quickening the pulse of every man, claiming attention from every woman as she sees the inevitable approach of the ballot to her hands, yea, enthusing the children as they proudly wear the badges of their parent-chosen candidates. And it is largely made so to be, by the county central committee, which within county limits lays hold on the precinct and ward, until the last soul of political unconcern is galvanized to sit up and take notice that somebody's going to be elected to office.

Thus do the 'sons of this world' around and before us play their games with the world's affairs,—expending time, means, energy, brains, all for the one desideratum of results! And results are had.

Infractions of Principle.

Granted that the games of the world as played show infractions of principle, some shadiness in methods, and imperfections in details, we are all more or less mixed up in the games as played, and the fact of their present and growing efficiency toward the end of results needs no affirmation. The Head of the church so characterized them in his day; twenty centuries of development to times of our intensified life has made them more wise.

These games with affairs of the world have a fascination immeasurable in their totality —yet they all, in their charm and strength are puny, when measured with the masterful might of the game to which the Church of the Living God is committed, the ennobling game of faith and love which purposes the making of the kingdoms of the world the kingdom of our Lord.

Rip Van Winkle's Mantle.

Too long the mantle of Rip Van Winkle has rested on the rank and file of the army of the 'children of the light.' Sleepy dreams of a captured world for Christ must be forgone for the sane and sound methods of a practical faith in militant action, else the world will outgrow and pass by the faith of whose treasures we are in God's grace the stewards.

There is logic in these facts and ways of worldly life—logic and power for the 'children of the light.' For a brotherhood so thoroughly free as is our own, so thoroughly American, so intensely democratic, a brotherhood with all popish pronunciamentoes, synodical mandates and ecclesiastical toggery as bridges burned behind it—for such a brotherhood as ours, there is, in these facts of worldly life, logic monumental.

Our radial of determinative action is in the authority of the local church enlightened by the word of truth: our primal message is passionate pleading for unity amidst the hosts of faith; the biggest responsibility we face as a people is the practice of the unity we have preached, in consecrated arousement on the program of human helpfulness the gospel of Christ lays down.

Hearers Must Become Doers.

Already as mere 'hearers of the word' we press well toward the two million stage; In becoming more largely 'doers of the word' lies our chief self-justification, for the gauge of apostolic orthodoxy is human helpfulness. Our wealth as a people is two thirds fallow and needs plowing for returns in benevolent fields; our natural, logical field for cultivation by unified practice on the gospel program of human helpfulness, is the county field, wherein alone we may steer clear of the Scylla of ecclesiastical tyranny and avoid the Charybdis of anarchical irresponsibility.

Already, here and there the land over, our people have sensed the plain pointing of the faith, we may turn the key whereby to enter and are in action on the county basis, religiously. On this basis, I have unalterable faith, we may turn the key whereby to enter the promised land of an enlarged and growing efficiency on the gospel program.

Two facts of self-evident import confront us: First that in most instances the bone and sinew of the county seat has come from the country or village churches through the modern resistless drift from rural to urban centers, and that fact obligates the county seat church to persistent concern for the rural centers of faith that have supplied its strength. Second: the worth of co-operative actively is no where nor how more convincingly established than on the patent lines of county life where the 'sons of this world' move efficiently for commercial, political and educational ends.

Lethargy of Light Bearers.

In the face of these facts, shall the 'children of the light' presistently manifest less wisdom than the 'sons of this world'? Not unless light bearers stay lethargic beyond arousement. In these affairs of community relation transformations of worth are evolved, just as, on the truism that human action may supplement divers actions in natural processes we make pippins from crabapples, percherons from ponies and electric motors from the bandaging of invisible forces.

As workers together with God, transformations more marvelous await our forth-going for social good in the spirit of Him whose we are and whom we serve. Taking things as they are in the world we have but to act on their suggestions. In the county seat church presumably, are men of vision, of consecration, of catholic sympathies and means —who need but to see clearly the promise of county co-operation to afford it initiative, realization and persistent support thereafter.

Yesterday and Tomorrow.

The day of a mere gastronomical jollification about a religious basket dinner spread, relieved by a program wheron skypiloting stars from afar juggle the constellations with rhetorical flourishes, is a yester-day! A day is at hand for tomorrow, when every religious convention of little size or large will hitch up with some practical program, some definite item of kingdom desire for accomplishment, and put strength on that thing until it is done to the glory of God. The effervescing enthusiasm and uplift that cant be attached to a deed for the King's honor had better remain corked, as, in its lack of practical issue, it is a dead waste of means and nervous energy for all who travail in its bringing forth.

A plan of procedure then will bring us down to the brass tacks of the problem of the church in the county. At the risk of commonplaceness and of dealing with matters already well known, I'll sketch a plan of flexible proportions, as the elemental, fundamental necessity in county co-operation.

County Board of Directors.

Primarily a county board of directors should be constituted by each congregation selecting two of its members as its representatives theron. They have knowledge of their own, and in consultation with each other can secure knowledge of all other congregations of the county. As advisers with each other on the good of the cause, they can consider the county needs, plan how to meet them, and unanimously adopt ways for forward moves. Their county vision may be stretched to state limits, thence to national, thence the world around—and line upon line, precept upon precept, they may articulate by persistent, patient effort every available church member to definite benevolent responsibility for the kingdom's strengthening. It is for the county board member to select and advise a definite task, like a particular thing in missions, education, church extension or some other, and then for every board member to face his home congregation with the challenge, Brethren, behold this great field for service! Let us plow a furrow in it for investments in heavenly treasure: let us do what we are able to do along this line, and the church, if given the vision, will rise to its realization and manifest thereby a healthful growth in the grace of God.

Knowledge Will Grow.

These board members, serving not for one year but several, will have their knowledge of the fields of need so to grow as to lead their congregational brethren to alignmer for the benevolent responsibilities of th church at large. Laymen they should b rather than preachers, because they are mo stationary and less migratory than preacher and no man's going or coming should di turb the steady pulse of any congregation concern for conquest moves on the world.

Officers of Board.

Within the board its officers should b chosen. A president having county sympa thies, knowledge and acquaintance, with d ties such as usually pertain to an executiv in voluntary associations. A vice-presider may redeem his superfluous office by the on thing of responsibility for the meetings o the county churches in all their materia appointments. A treasurer should be ha through whose hands to the proper benef cieries contributions may flow in familia channels, reporting at every board meeting o convention; his comparative figures will stim ulate and encourage the churches to a health ful rivalry in the prosecution of good work The secretary should record, not only conve tion proceedings, but during the interim b tween conventions, by carbon copies of common letter to all the churches throug their board representatives, present the trea urer's reports, present facts of common inte est to the life of all the churches, and abov all, sound the challenge of every approachin benevolence in its season, that the churche be not asleep at the switch when its tim arrives; thus, prodding the forgetful, arou ing the listless, enlisting the dilatory, keepin at the job of arousement with patience an kindness,—until arousement comes as th reward of faith and patience.

Simplicity a Basic Merit.

Now here is a plan with the basic merit o simplicity and having no claim to infall bility. It is flexible and may apply in state where district rather than county limitation are advisable through scarcity of churches it is entirely tentative as a plan, susceptibl of additions or modifications looking towar efficiency in particular fields, and free fro any taint of ecclesiasticism. If such a pla on model lines could be nationally distribute by our Home Society, with the allowabl plea that it be weighed as a help to efficiency that it be worked as a plan, with patience persistence and optimism—everywhere—i might be consequential, the little step t ward realizing unity of action on our ben volences.

Initiative, Authority, Responsibility.

It places all initiative, all authority, a responsibility on the 'children of the ligh from the churches within county or distric confines, and makes their co-operation neighborhood or community pride wherei their delight may be the doing of the wi of the Lord in programs of human helpfulnes with gospel warrant.

Such is a sane philosophy of action fo the church in the county. With no spiri of iconoclasm, but as a mere conserver an up-gatherer of the methods and tendencie already having wide usage in our brothe hood ranks, as a would-be constructionist o simple methods of work from the ground u I submit it, with the claim that we ar nationally and locally on the verge of ove capitalization in the matter of convention They burden our preachers, and our peopl are too busy to heed their interminable calls We have come into the wilderness of a super fluity of machinery, and as advocates of return to the simple gospel, nothing mor befits us then a return to simple method of administration for larger and more effi cient work.

State and National Work.

The indispensibility of national and stat organizations must be granted along wi that of the local congregational officiary of elders and deacons. I make bold to advocate the elimination of all machinery of conventions between local church and the national or state organizations, with the claim that, the county unit, if a model basis of organization and co-operation be slowly universally adopted, is the missing link between our sleeping unconcerned forces on the one hand, and the fields for conquest. No problem or responsibility confronting the brotherhood is too big, none too small to be helped by co-operation on the county basis.

Counties lacking sufficient forces for organization are logical fields for the action of adjacent counties with strength, and through them, by county and state organization teamwork, our stakes can be enlarged.

County Churches Hold Together.

A self chosen and common responsibility will hold the churches of any county together on a line of practical action. The annual county convention has a social pull on the neighborhood condition no other gathering can exercise. The annual excess of inspiration and uplift, commonly dissipated as the dinner is digested and the speeches forgotten, if linked up with a definite, practical responsibility of benevolent kind, if conserved and consecrated on a co-operative line, will bear fruit, where now in a major way it is annually allowed to waste in forgetfulness.

One brotherhood benevolence can be taken, or better the entire field of them, and through the county board members as agitators, educators and propagandists, the major number of churches can be prompted to symmetrical support of them all.

By-paths of Religious Inertia.

That is presenting visions to the 'children of the light' lacking which they fail and fall in the by-paths of religious inertia. Every day that is sacred to a cause; every cause that is sacred to church progress can have its season of stress and arousel; all being inspired, all informed and all consecrated to definite aim and practical effort.

One thing and only one prevents fruition from all our fine plans and schemes—the strategic thing of personal dependability in posts of trust. To find the rare man in every church who as a soldier in the ranks will stand on grounds of conscience in relation to every obligation sustained by his church to the world—who will gently prod his pastor and his brethren until his church has had a chance to help on specific needs—there, is the crux of all co-operative plans.

Great Opportunity.

Such a man can be found or trained in every church. If he will but stand dependable, through all the dilatoriness of his brethren, feeling with all the weight of dismayless moral persuasion as the crusader of old "God wills it" the church in the county, in being raised from her slough of unconcern, in being inspired to lay out her strength on lines that will make for conquest, can deepen the spiritual worth and heighten the moral stature of every Christian. For such a man, these final words hold a philosophy of action; hearing and heeding these words, he is the key to the situation:

"There are thousands to tell you it cannot be done—
There are thousands to prophesy failure;
There are thousands to point out to you one by one
The dangers that wait to assail you.
But just buckle in, with a bit of a grin,
Then take off your hat and go to it!
Just start in to sing—as you tackle the thing
That cannot be done—and you'll do it!"

Non-Christian Faiths in America

By Elizabeth B. Vermilye

One of the fundamental ideals of this nation is religious freedom for oneself and toleration for one's neighbor. However, in as much as from the beginning our nation has been a Christian one, our claim of complete religious tolerance has really been applied in connection with the different forms and expressions of Christianity.

The bulk of "the old immigration" bore the stamp of Christianity, Catholic or Protestant; non-Christian faiths were looked at across continents and only vividly realized by foreign missionaries or traders to the East. To be sure, Mormonism, that anomaly of times and systems, was with us, but so few in adherents, negligible in position, so far off in location and influence, that it usually was not recognized as hybrid and alien, when met as "Church of Latter Day Saints of Jesus Christ." However, the new immigration, with its Asiatic element, has brought into our country the "heathen religions" upon whose overthrow, in foreign countries, we have spent millions of dollars and sacrificed hundreds of lives.

Hinduism Growing Here.

Hinduism in one of its six orthodox forms, Vedantism, is making many converts here. Buddhism—following in the wake of Chinese and Japanese—has established itself on our western coasts, with temples and shrines, one of which contains an ancient and very sacred image of the Buddha, worshiped by all the faithful. To these, not only old-time Buddhists but new converts of Anglo-Saxon blood are being drawn.

Theosophy, while claiming to be of all—though above all—religions, is in its views and practices, most in sympathy with the religion of Buddha. The ancient and divine wisdom, which Buddha claimed to have found above any other leader or sage, is the same as that which Theosophy is spreading, with wide acceptance, through every part of our land. These ancient faiths in modern dress come to this nominally Christian nation with the assertion that they interfere with no faith, but can respect and assimilate any truth. They speak of the Christ with respect—often with reverence; they quote his sayings and show interest in his life and teachings; but each places its own teachers and prophets above him in authority, and denies the very essence and meaning of his religion.

The Latest Importation.

The latest of these prophets who brings to us "the message of the East" is Abdul Baha, the present head of the religion first known as "Babism." This faith was founded by "the Bab" (meaning the deer), as a reform of Mohammedanism in Persia, as Buddhism was originally a reform of Brahamism in India. The "Baha," is the nephew of "the Bab" who perished under persecution in Persia. He has come to America with a message of universal peace. He has been received in many Christian pulpits to give his message, which in answer to a written question he declares to be "the message of the spiritual, brought from the land where the spiritual is understood," and offered to us "in exchange for our understanding of the material." He speaks of "his Holiness Mohammet," "his Holiness Abraham," and "his Holiness Christ," but gives precedence, of course, to the first. A place of worship and a number of teaching centers have been opened and there are already many Bahaists in America.

Increase of Non-Christian Faiths.

The latest religious census of 1910 gives the increase of these non-Christian faiths as less than 1 per cent; this does not include Mormonism whose gain alone has been 38 per cent. Neither were these figures claimed to be exact, for the Theosophists never give numbers; the Vedantists are often merged in other religious organizations, and the census was taken in 1906 before the "heathen invasion" became of noticeable proportions. With 50,000,000 in the United States without any religious affiliations; with almost 1,000,000 Mormons; with fast filling ranks of openly, or in reality, non-Christian faiths —how long will this nation have the right to call itself "Christian?" All these religions in themselves may not affect largely the life of the nation but we have only to study their fruits in the lands of their birth to realize the type of morality, standards of living and national character which they produce. Many of these faiths in their esoteric teachings are beautiful and mysteriously attractive; but would we choose India instead of Germany; Turkey instead of Italy; or even Japan instead of America, as standards of national excellence?

Menace of Mormonism.

But the universal brotherhood of Theosophy, and Buddhism; the universal oneness of Brahmanism and Vedantism; the universal peace of Bahaism, will not bring this nation into internal contest and external disgrace. Only Mormonism—that mixture as one has said "of Mohammedanism, Judaism, Paganism, and Diabolism" with its claim of right to "universal dominion" founded on divine decree—is a menace to the honor and well-being of the nation.

What is Mormonism? In its last analysis, Mormonism is an aggressive hierarchy, owning one state, politically controlling at least seven others, claiming the right to govern absolutely "from the cradle to the grave" every act—including of course the vote—of every adherent. It constitutes a compact kingdom, within our republic, under the absolute control of one man, "divinely appointed," with unlimited resources in lives and money; so compact in its organization, so far reaching in its power, that no lines of government, commerce, or industry in this country to-day entirely escape its influence.

It is said that relatively to its size and numbers, the Mormon Church is the most powerful organization in the world. The divine order of plural marriages known by the world as polygamy, is at the root of the belief of the Mormon Church; absolutely inseparable from its teachings of God, of morality, of the family life and relations and of the very nature of Heaven itself. Since the admission to statehood, on pledge of giving up the practice of polygamy, the nation has believed it "as dead as the inquisition;" but the residents in Utah, those who have been converts and those who have investigated

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

The Women Who Work

The women wage-earners of this country present a serious problem in these days—a problem in which the women of leisure should take a peculiar and vital interest. No women of any previous age have ever had so much leisure as the American women of the present time. This is not saying that the modern woman may not be "rushed to death" in many pursuits; but it is saying that because of changed social conditions and greater prosperity the well-to-do woman today has more time at her command than any of her ancestors had. She owes her leisure largely to a "machine-made age." Does it seem too much that she should be interested in those who run the machines; that she should devote some of her leisure to the needs of those who give it to her—particularly to the women?

The American woman has responded with disinterestedness and enthusiasm to almost every call for help. No one is more efficient than she in charitable or philanthropic or missionary work. A crippled child or a whole hospital of incurables, an orphan or a whole asylum finds instant response to its appeal. But women must go deeper than ever before and study the social problems of the day. Sometimes the situation calls for neither charity nor philanthropy. Sometimes the need for either could be obviated by merely seeing that simple justice is done.

Simple Problems Simple Solutions.

Problems used to be simple, and were therefore settled by simple methods. "Have you ever had a strike in this mill?" asked a visitor in a small mill town a few years ago. "Oh, no," replied the mill-hand; "ye see him and her allus looks after us when we're sick." There the personal element solved the problem. The feeling of genuine interest and sympathy between employer and employé made smooth sailing for both. It has been worked out in a still larger way by many an individual employer. A successful manufacturer of Philadelphia, for example, began, years ago, to work out this spirit toward those whom he employed. He not only looked after them when they were ill—by a salaried physician, and a partially free dispensary—but he looked after them when they were well. He built sanitary houses for them, the moderate rent of which might go toward purchase; before the days of public kindergartens, he maintained a kindergarten for the children, and a model Sunday-school; he supplied light and air to his workers, he gave them refreshment and rest rooms. Moreover he paid them a living wage and gave them opportunity to buy an interest in the business. Here was a man who felt his personal responsibility for the safety and health of his workers. After a while he learned that even from a selfish point of view it paid. During the whole existence of that factory it has never had a strike. But should the wage-earner's welfare depend upon the personality of the employer? Should it be left for the individual to settle? It might do in the old days, but now the problem can no longer be solved by this simple method. But the same spirit can do much, quite as much as ever it could. Indeed it is our spirit—our attitude of mind—which is of the first importance. It is of far more import than the little we can individually do. If we persistently hold the right attitude of mind things will, in time, be done. In order to feel aright we must endeavor to know and understand. There is much to learn about the conditions under which the wage-earning women work before we can think intelligently, much less do anything wisely. What do we know, for instance, about the 400,000 self-supporting women in New York? Seventy thousand of these are employed in the manufacture and finishing of clothing. Tucking alone keeps scores of girls busy all day. Conditions vary tremendously. Many factories have light and air; some have neither, with no conveniences, and are a menace to health. Sometimes the girls work in dire confusion; sometimes they are ill-paid; always the watchword is speed. Speed means more money; speed means preferment; it may mean permanent work. "That it may also become synonymous with nervous wreckage, premature age and even death is not considered in the mad race to turn out the finished product."

Why Educational Advantages are Unappreciated.

Some people are wondering why the remedy of educational advantages which they offer to these mill-hands is unappreciated. They cannot understand why, out of 1,289 women in 111 different establishments who were interviewed in eight New England towns, only 12 per cent were making use of opportunities for instruction. But of what use are clubs and classes when the working women are too fatigued to give the necessary intellectual effort? Would it not be more to the point to spend energy in trying to remove the causes of over-fatigue in their factories? These women are not working for pin-money but from compulsion and many earn but $7 a week. In Chicago among the 30,000 engaged in making clothing much the same conditions obtain; sometimes better, sometimes worse, according to the individual employer. There is much discontent, much stolidity, much dull endurance. In the coal-fields of Pennsylvania, another set of conditions offers fresh problems. Here the foreigners—Slavs, Italians, Irish, Germans—have few opportunities to learn English and are thus shut out from any opportunity for betterment. Most of them are Roman Catholics and the priests urge the people not to learn English.

The Curse of Drink.

Drink is a great curse. They doubtless drank in their home countries, but there they had little to spend while here they spend much and the drink is adulterated. Amusements all center around liquor, drinking and dancing, and lax moral conditions are the result—fights, murders and vice. Many factories employ young girls, and the child-labor laws are not enforced. The towns are crude, cheap and dirty, and there is dangerous overcrowding. How little the average person knows of the women in these regions or of their real needs. In many a town there is hardly a house where, in winter, a person may take a bath in private, yet it might never have occurred to one of us that a public bath-house was one of the chief needs of each town. Another crying need is the same there as in our large cities—halls for wholesome, lively amusement.

We think we know a great deal about the clerks in department stores. We hear a great deal about the alluring life of the "saleslady," dressed up as if for exhibition, patting her mounds or puffs of hair, and spending all her earnings on clothes and willow plumes. An investigation was made recently in seven of our largest cities among the clerks of department stores and this is what was discovered: In New York over 84 per cent turned all their earnings into the home; in St. Paul and Minneapolis nearly 50 per cent; and in St. Louis over 77 per cent did the same. The average wage was $6.88 and the average amount contributed to the home $5.39.

The Woman Metal Worker.

Almost unknown is the woman metal worker, who has one of the hardest of tasks. The buildings in which she works are so filled with machinery that the whole structure throbs constantly and the vibration in some departments—such as that where the silk covering is woven around electrical cord—is almost unendurable. Nine hours of it!

In other processes the strain on the eyes is terrific, in still another the odor of gas always pervades the room, and makes the workers ill. Nine hours of it! No wonder that, unless every help is given them, these women and girls are found at noon time lying about half-exhausted. Sometimes a factory shows the possibilities for endurable work in spite of the necessary noise, and trying conditions. Ample light, air and space, dressing and lunch rooms, hot tea and coffee, the employment of a visiting woman physician who organizes clubs for dancing and good times, and no one earning less than $6 a week—these conditions make it possible to endure even such hard work with safety and health.

Not All Can Work Professionally.

Not every woman who is interested in the welfare of the women wage-earners can be a social worker in the practical sense. It would not be well if she could. Few have time to study and do the work intelligently, few have discernment and tact enough to do it effectively. But every one can help. There are things we can all do. We can make an honest attempt to learn actual conditions; we can cultivate a proper and intelligent sympathy—not the maudlin sympathy which empties its pocketbook at the pitiful tale of a sick baby and thinks its duty done, but the intelligent sympathy which seeks to find out the cause of the baby's illness—whether from neglect, unsanitary housing or under-feeding—and hastens to remove it. Not the sympathy which wrings its hands over sweatshop conditions, but the consistent sympathy which persistently demands and is willing to pay for goods which are not sweated. Not the sympathy which believes every tale of the agitator who plays upon the ignorance of the worker and thrusts hundreds of satisfied wage-earners out of the factories; but the patient sympathy which studies to learn the truth, to discriminate between an enforced uprising through ignorance and a protest against injustice; the sympathy which works for the better laws and backs up every effort being made for social betterment. We come back to the statement with which we started, namely, that the little we can actually do is of far less importance than that we should persistently maintain a right attitude of mind, an attitude of interest and sympathy and friendliness toward the women who work.

Robert Graham Frank reports a visit to the home of the venerable Dr. T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, who has been recovering from a surgical operation. He found him, he says, "sitting up, able to take a ride each day, and with his mind as clear as day and his heart as full of love for all men as it has always been."

The resignation of J. P. Myers, of Marion, Ind., recorded elsewhere calls attention to a three years' ministry of hard work and exceptional results. Mr. Myers followed J. Boyd Jones, one of the most vigorous and resourceful preachers in Indiana, now pastor at Anderson. The new house was completed under Myers' leadership and $11,600 raised on an old debt. Three hundred persons have been added to the membership. The pastorate will close the last Sunday in December. No information has reached us as to Mr. Myers' future plans but he will, no doubt, in the interval be receiving invitations to serve some strong churches.

Marshall Street and Ogden Avenue churches, Richmond, Va., will be consolidated Jan. 1, under the name Hanover Street Church. The combined congregation will number close to 700 members. Marshall Street's pastor has been Geo. W. Kemper. and Allen Avenue's H. P. Atkins. The resignation of Mr. Atkins, recently announced in these pages, was made the occasion of the union movement. Mr. Kemper will minister to the new congregation in the partially completed building of the Allen Avenue church which is to be finished by a total expenditure of close to $50,000.

Missouri's New Sunday-school Leader.

Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., president of the state board, introduces and stands sponser for I. E. Reid the new Sunday-school superintendent for Missouri. Mr. Reid comes from a pastorate in Middlesboro, Ky. He is a graduate of the College of the Bible and of Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., and has his B. D. degree from Union Theological Seminary, New York. With such training he will no doubt be a capable educational leader. His work began Nov. 1. His home will be in Kansas City. His office will be in State Board headquarters, 1201 R. A. Long Bldg.

Some Definite Goals Set.

Gibson City, Ill., church, L. O. Lehman, pastor, has determined to close the old year with certain definite things accomplished, and has consecrated itself to a "Fifty-day Campaign" with the following ends in view: 1. Financial: Every current obligation paid by every organization associated with the church. 2. Church: Attendance at morning service 150, attendance at prayer meeting 50, additions to the church membership 25, every evening service evangelistic. 3. Bible School: average attendance for the period 250, new scholars 25. 4. Christian Endeavor Society: Reorganization with at least 25 dependable, active members, and an average attendance at the meetings of 25. 5. C. W. B. M.: Membership increased to 50.

Louisville Convention Badges as Awards.

Those who attended the Louisville convention will remember the beautiful badge which was used there. This was unquestionably the most beautiful badge we have ever used in our general conventions. The pendant containing the design of old Cane Ridge, the oldest building of our people in existence, alone teaches an important lesson in our history. Ten thousand badges were left over from the convention. The Sunday-school department of the American Christian Missionary Society has purchased the entire lot and will give them to every Sunday-school pupil, old or young, giving one dollar or more in the American Mission offering. The supply is limited, and the schools that remit first will be the ones to secure this special award.

Franklin Circle Autumn Banquet.

The men of the Franklin Circle Brotherhood, Cleveland, Ohio, held their annual banquet on a recent evening. It was ladies' night and the one hundred and seventy-five who sat around the banquet tables after the daintily served dinner enjoyed a splendid address by J. R. Ewers of Pittsburgh, the guest of honor of the evening. The local Downtown Christian Service in St. Louis.

Suggested no doubt by the successful Sunday Evening Club of Chicago, which holds a down-town service each Sunday evening in Orchestra Hall, Mr. Frederick A. Mayhall, a layman in Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, inaugurated a series of down-town services in Shubert Theater, on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 10, being unable to secure a theater for the evening. Mr. Mayhall was assisted by B. A. Abbott, his pastor, and the choir of Union Ave. Church. "In the theater and hotel zone" he said, "there is no Protestant church, yet there are 190,000 people living in this district. Nine of the largest theaters play to crowded houses every night and the guests of the twenty-four largest hotels have no place to attend worship without going uptown. It is my ambition to make these services nonsectarian and to have the co-operation of all zealous church workers." Mr. Mayhall intends to have noted speakers address these meetings. Champ Clark was engaged for this first one to speak on "The Book of Books" but was unable to be present.

Pastor Smith and Decatur First Church.

First Church, Decatur, Ill., E. M. Smith, pastor, has received drawings of a beautiful new house of worship which it is proposed shall be erected on the site of the present "Tabernacle." The new church will cost about $25,000. A friend of the congregation has given $10,000 of this sum to the church provided the remaining $15,000 can be raised by the church from other sources. A large part of the remaining $15,000 already has been pledged and it is hoped that the entire sum will be received before the spring of 1913. During the last week of the revival, which begins in the Christian church on November 10, the question of raising the remainder of the $15,000 will be taken up. Pastor Smith is one of the rarest souls in the Illinois ministry and has wrought a great work in the Decatur Church, especially in healing ancient wounds caused by misunderstandings between the two strong congregations there.

Pastor Furthers Social Life of Congregation.

A series of monthly "sociables," arranged by the pastor himself, with the end in view of "socializing the church," is part of the program announced by Edgar Dewitt Jones for his First Church in Bloomington, Ill., during the coming months. These "sociables" he indicates as follows: 1. The Bible Study Club—the second Mnday in Nvember; 2. The C. W. B. M.—the second Wednesday in December; 3. Primary Mothers' Circle—the second Wednesday in January; 4. Christian Endeavor Society—the second Wednesday in February; 5. Official Board—the second Wednesday in March; 6. Young Ladies' Society—the second Wednesday in April; 7. Benevolent and Missionary Society—the second Wednesday in June. First church raised $11,339 the past year; all bills were paid at the date of their recent annual meeting and an aggregate balance of over $300 in the various treasuries was reported. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, will hold an evangelistic meeting for Mr. Jones following Easter.

A Big and Worthy Plan for New York.

Some good press agent is getting secular publicity for an alleged event at the Louisville convention which none of the religious papers, apparently, knows any thing about. The report is that New York Disciples "proposed to the convention" that they would raise on the New York field the sum of $150,000 provided the "convention" would secure $350,000 with which to erect an appropriate and creditable Disciple church building in New York City. Whether this proposal was actually made or not it truly ought to be made and ought to be received by somebody seriously. The plea of the New York Disciples is that there should be created in the lagest city in America a house of worship large in size, beautiful, and centrally located. This need stands out for many reasons they say. Disciples have about a dozen churches in New York, including Brooklyn, and one of them, with property worth about $150,000, is to be sold, and included in the proposed new plant. It is the intention of the New York Disciples to place the new building in a prominent location in Manhattan. While many churches in Manhattan cost more than $500,000, including site, it is claimed that that sum will make a fairly good property, capable of commanding the respect of the metropolis and conserving the Disciples' membership that is continually moving into the great city from western cities where the churches are strong.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

O. M. Eaton is in a meeting at Bone Gap with Frank Shane. Mr. Shane lives at Effingham and preaches for Bone Gap and Parkersburg.

S. H. Kuntz of Eureka preaches half time for the Malone church and half time for Pittwood. Sixteen persons were added at Pittwood in eight months.

E. U. Smith has been called to remain another year at Windsor. The call was unanimous and hearty. He has done a splendid work there and the church is in fine condition.

At the state board meeting the Program Committee for the next convention was appointed: S. E. Fisher, Champaign, chairman; E. A. Gilliland, Bloomington; and J. F. Rosborough, Clinton.

Clyde Darsie, of Jacksonville, was elected to the board of directors to fill out the unexpired term of W. W. Sniff, Paris, who is removing from the state.

S. E. Fisher of Champaign was appointed on the Anti-Saloon League Committee in place of W. W. Sniff.

Let us kindly urge all Illinois preachers to pull hard for the November offering, unless you have already sent in a double offering. It devolves upon the ministry to inform the churches on the subject of our work. Without the hearty support of the preachers we can do but little. But with their aid, wholehearted and enthusiastic, our offering will be large, and we can do a proportionately large work.

W. D. Dewesse,
J. Fred Jones,
Secretaries.

Ohio Secretary's Letter

In the midst of campaign for offerings for Ohio Missions the friends of the work will be interested to know something of the more recent happenings in the mission churches themselves.

C. C. Cowgill of Middletown reports a meeting with thirteen additions to date. They expect to clear the indebtedness on the tabernacle in thirty days and will follow with a campaign to raise money to pay for their lots. One hundred and fifty-nine were in Sunday-school November 10. The average attendance for October exceeded that of September by 22.

L. I. Mercer held a short meeting in the church at Lancaster in October with 22 additions.

The church at Marion under the leadership of Chas. A. Pearce is steadily moving forward in the accomplishment of the real problems before it. The current expenses are all paid and the church is entering into a vigorous campaign to raise money for the building fund. Both the Sunday-school and preaching services have the encouragement of a growing attendance. There were seven additions to the membership of the church in October.

B. S. Johnson is the new minister at Norwalk. The Sunday-school had a rally day recently at which the attendance was 170. This was 63 more than the largest attendance in the previous history of the church. The average attendance for October was more than 50 per cent greater than that of September.

At Tiffin under the leadership of Webster Moore there have been 25 additions to the membership of the church since he took up the work last spring. The Sunday-school has been reorganized and its attendance almost doubled.

The committee has arranged for a volunteer meeting in our East Toledo mission church, T. W. Pinkerton, of Kenton, assisting the pastor, J. A. Cargill.

First returns from Ohio Day offering give encouraging promise of a good year in that regard. It is hoped that every church in the state will be represented in this constructive work. I. J. Cahill.

Sunday-Schools and American Missions

New President American Society Speaks Urgently.

Sunday-school Day for American Missions, Nov. 24, should be observed in every Sunday-school in the land. Thanksgiving will mean more to the children and the grown people as well if each one has previously given something to assist in making of our people a more thoroughly Christian nation and for the transforming of the lives of the foreigners who come to our shores. Next October we shall hold the first convention of our history in our sister nation to the North. Canada is a great mission field for our plea and our people. If the Sunday-schools will give this year $50,000, which is but a reasonable amount, we can do some work in Canada that will be worthy of us and when next year we go to Toronto, we will not be ashamed of the work we are going in that land. I trust each superintendent and minister will give the school an oportunity to express their thanksgiving for all the blessings they are enjoying in this great Christian land. They will respond with joy and gladness. Do not miss the present opportunity to help your own school and to be a help to others. George A. Miller.

Washington, D. C.

Not to Make a Record But to Meet a Necessity

In the new era of Ministerial Relief that has been well inaugurated we have endeavored to send a letter and some printed matter to every church in the brotherhood. Each has been asked for a definite amount well within its proved ability, and we believe its assured interest, and the total less than the immediate needs of the work.

Two necessities are upon us beyond our resent resources. First, we ought to pay orthy pensions to the retired missionaries f both the Foreign Christian Missionary Soiety and the Christian Woman's Board of Iissions. Second, we must increase many of ur winter payments to the dollar-a-day-asis that ought to be maintained throughut the year.

If any church does not receive a letter, it s not because its fellowship is not desired, ut because our lists are necessarily incomlete. Such congregations, as well as those hat hear from us directly, should observe the ay, December 15, and either make an offerng then or send at least ten per cent of the udget for all general offerings. Envelopes or the offering and leaflets for information re supplied free and freely on request.

Foreign Society Notes

A cablegram has been received at the Forign Society announcing the burning of our plendid press in Jubbulpore, India, with a oss of about $5,000. The press has been oing a great work in printing tracts, books, ooklets, Sunday-school helps, etc. It has urnished employment for a number of hristian Hindi. Dr. G. W. Brown, in charge f the work at Jubbulpore, cables us to make rgent appeal at once for funds that the ress may be rebuilt. We hope that friends ill respond to the appeal.

The growth of our membership in foreign ands is very gratifying. Ten years ago we ad 6,000 members. Last year the missionries reported 13,464, or a gain of 123 per ent in a decade. We ought to be able to reatly increase the membership in the next ecade. We are in position now to go forward more rapidly than in former years.

Dr. M. E. Poland, Nantungchow, China, says, "Two weeks ago I had the supreme joy of baptizing thirty-two in the lake near our West Gate. The next day our native evangelist baptized thirteen in the chapel. Of the forty-five in all, six were men in our employ, including my personal teacher. Last night we had our first prayer meeting at the new hospital and fifteen of these men led in prayer. Fifty of us sat quietly and listened. After the baptism I preached to the new and old converts. When I asked them how much they understood they answered, We understood all you said and it was very helpful to us."

James Ware, Shanghai, China, says, "Our schools have all started and every department of the work is in full swing. Cholera has been rife in Shanghai, but I rejoice to say that all of our people have been kept in peace and health."

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India, received a Dunbar medal for proficiency as a medical missionary. The commissioner held a formal and public meeting in the town hall when it was formally presented. This is a fine compliment to Dr. Drummond for the government to recognize the value of his work in this way. F. M. RAINS, Secy.

conditions—uninfluenced by Mormon guides—testify unflinchingly to the fact that polygamy is a living institution and only needs the freedom of power, or protection, to become a national issue. Ex-Senator Cannon declared in New York, a few months ago, that "polygamy was never so aggresive, so wide-spread, so openly practiced among young Mormons as now." Bishop Spaulding of Utah, and many other residents in that state, fully corroborate this statement. Polygamy is only one item, although a vital one, of the Mormon propaganda. On this issue, however, the Mormon Church was saved from disruption in its early history; it is held together by it to-day, as it involves so many side issues—of family pride and loyalty; of religious standing and commercial prosperity; of real religious beliefs; and of the status and place of those unfortunate women—the plural wives and their children.

The power of the Mormon hierarchy with our government can be somewhat estimated when we consider that Reed Smoot——one of the twelve "Apostles" of the Mormon Church—is a leading senator; chairman of the Government Publicity Bureau; close friend of the President, and of Senator Aldrich, whose measures he always supports. In the investigation for expulsion from the senate, "it was not proven" that Reed Smoot was a polygamist; he was not, however, tried on that issue. It was abundantly proven that he was a leader, and "apostle" in an organization which stands for polygamy; whose supreme and "infallible" head—by his own sworn testimony—has, and intends to keep five wives, because by not doing so, he would "violate the command of God and be damned." On this ground, and because he had sworn allegiance to the church above the nation, the investigating committee recommended the expulsion of Smoot.

The authority of Mormonism is based on the divinity of the "book of Mormon," a curious medley of many styles, with parts taken from the Koran. The glaring mistakes, absurdities, and anachronisms of this book are visible at a glance to any intelligent reader, but it is the way of life to nearly a million people.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

Prof. Emil Carl Wilm, Ph.D.

The Problem of Religion

This is a thoroughly important, intelligible, readable discussion of an interesting but difficult theme. Professor Wilm possesses some of the best literary qualities of Professors James and Royce. He is less technical than either, almost completely avoiding unfamiliar terms. He states the idealist position in a way that is intelligible to the general reader, and shows clearly that its logical issue is faith in God. The discussion of the question of The Value of Life, "Is there moral progress?" a defense of optimism, is an inspiring chapter. The philosophical consideration of the reality of a future life will be helpful to troubled minds. The tone of the essay is reverent, rational, encouraging.

Bound in cloth.
Price $1.25 net, postage 10 cents.

Amos R. Wells

The Ideal Adult Class

A brilliant little book on Adult Bible Class, containing a dozen or more chapters and supplemented by over one hundred short, pithy paragraphs or "receipts" for making the adult class go. There are other books on Adult Bible Classes and their work, but none that contain the amount of workable suggestions that Mr. Wells includes in this. Uniform with Mr. Wells' little b ok, "The Teacher that Teaches."

Price 50 cents net, postage 5 cents.

George T. Smart

The Temper of the American People

Dr. Smart's Temper of the American People is an interesting study of American character and customs by an Englishman. It frequently draws comparison with English temper and habit. It is not infallible, and many of its interpretations will be questioned. But it helps us "to see ourselves as ithers see us"—the other in this case being a man of trained mind and good judgment. He shows a remarkably wide range of vision. His topics are not those conventionally anticipated. The Sense of History, Fact Idea and Telling in America, The Estimate of Population, are chapters dealing with America from new angles.

Price $1.25 net, postage 10 cents.

Man or Machine—Which?

or An Interpretation of Ideals at Work in Industry

The life of those who labor in the great industrial centers of America challenges the attention of every citizen. "Al Priddy" has given a vivid picture of his own early life in the remarkable autobiography, "Through the Mill." But one wants to know more. Do boys still suffer in mills as he suffered? What are the conditions today in other great industries? In this book the author has told, as no one else has told, the true story of American factory life and the struggle for character. Uniform in binding with Dr. Gladden's "The Labor Question."

The Life of the Soul

Characterized by the width of view, the freshness of thought, the keen insight, the wealth of literary illustration that have become familiar in Mr. Brierley's writing. UNTO ME, or The Religious Quality of Social Work

Crystallized into this brilliant essay by Prof. Rauschenbusch is the essence of Christ's message and his interpretation of life.

Helen Campbell, author of "Prisoners of Poverty," says: "One closes the little book with the sense of a great organ note—a tender yet mystic tone in the words, which themselves make music. It should be in the hands of every social worker, no matter what the faith they hold in church or state, for strength and inspiration go with it, the formulation of all the social worker seeks to promote."

Among the themes are: The Religious Quality of Social Work; Social Work Is Christian Work; Love for God Demands Love for Men; Love for Men Trains the Love for God; Social Work Brings a New Experience of Religion.

Prayers of the Social Awakening

Will be read over and over again by all lovers of true devotional literature.

"These prayers are breathed out of a beautiful soul as naturally and sweetly as fragrance rises from a flower. In this warm spiritual atmosphere the heart opens and the devotional spirit is kindled. These prayers are saturated with the social spirit, which is the essential spirit of Christianity. The book is an important contribution to the literature of Social Christianity. . . . This book will be the 'Imitation of Christ' for generations to come. . . I have never read anything that so aroused in me the devotional spirit." —Josiah Strong, President of the American Institute of Social Service.

H. Jeffs

Concerning Conscience

The author faces life as it actually is today—business, professional, social, political, and personal life—and discusses the place of an enlightened conscience in that life. A wide reading and experience furnish him with many apt illustrations of the points he makes.

Eucken and Bergson: Their Significance for Christian Thought

Eucken in Germany and Bergson in France are the two most fascinating and potent thinkers of the day. The writer of this book has an intimate and first-hand knowledge of the work of both thinkers and presents here a brilliant study of their ruling ideas.

Back to Religion

This is a notable and encouraging essay showing that the modern age is becoming dissatisfied with its purely material success and is turning for inspiration to religion. "In all deeper souls today is stirring a demand for an inner uplift of human nature, for a new idealism, and this demand will necessarily have to seek an alliance with religion," says the author. "Without religion genuine optimism is impossible."

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

A Plea for Thanksgiving Day

WHILE THERE HAS BEEN, IN RECENT years, a multiplication of legal holidays, there are two special days that are peculiarly American, and ought to preserve a foremost place in our national calendar. One of them is the Fourth of July; the other is Thanksgiving Day. The one commemorates independence from a foreign yoke; the other recognizes our dependence upon the Almighty Giver of all good and perfect gifts. Both of these days ought to be perpetually observed and in the right spirit.

Thanksgiving Day is an American festival, and came down to us from our Puritan forefathers. Nowhere did it take such deep and enduring root as in New England. I now recall its enthusiastic observance, during my early boyhood, in a community in western New York that came mostly from Berkshire County, Massachusetts. It was a more jubilant festival than Christmas; it was, in fact, the king day of the calendar. "Afar its coming shone." We boys counted the time until its arrival. The night before was a sad night in all the barnyards and turkey cotes and chicken-roosts; for the slaughter was terrible, and the cry of the feathered tribes was like "the mouring of Hadadrimmon." For that thanksgiving service the village pastor made elaborate preparation, and the choir rehearsed their finest "fuges" and their most resonant anthems. For that thanksgiving dinner every housewife tasked her culinary skill; it was the feast of fat things at which the most rigid Puritan ate, drank, and was merry.

One of the chief features of the annual festival was the reunion of scattered households. Children and grandchildren, kith and kindred, gathered once more in the old homestead. As in the times of David at Bethlehem, "there was a yearly sacrifice there for all the family." This is one of the many good reasons for perpetuating Thanksgiving days, and for observing them with the old-fashioned enthusiasm. We are a migratory people. From nearly every farmhouse and rural home some of the sons, and often some of the daughters, have gone into the cities to seek their livelihood. One boy may be off at college, and one daughter may be at a boarding-school. The Thanksgiving Day bell ought to ring all the scattered members of the flock into the family fold again; and in these times of rapid railway facilities a journey of hundreds of miles might well be undergone in order to give a kiss to a dear mother, and see a good old grandsire in his arm-chair. Steampipes and furnace-flues have not much romance in them; but when household love is to be rekindled, let it be around a rousing wood fire roaring on the hearth, and sending over the whole circle its ruddy glow.

It is a lamentable fact that of late the Thanksgiving Day has geen losing somewhat of its ancient authority and its religious character. Its sacred unction is departing; it is suffering a desecration very similar to the the growing desecration of God's holy Sabbath. Some people do not observe the Thanksgiving Day at all. Multitudes make it only a holiday for boisterous frolics and jovial convivialities. It has been a grievous scandal that a day set apart for honoring God has been dishonored by contending football elevens. There are many innocent and wholesome recreations that the overworked classes may indulge in that leave no "redness of eyes" or remorse of conscience.

The serious blow that has been dealt to Thanksgiving Day by too many good people has been the neglect to "assemble themselves in houses of worship, and render thanks to Almighty God" for a year of mercies and unnumbered blessings. Except when some unusual topic is announced by some eloquent pulpiteer, the congregations are slender, and the service too often is perfunctory and lifeless. Ministers frequently fail to give a right direction to the service. One man devotes the day to a political harangue; another one relieves himself of some pent-up thoughts on some secular topic that he would be afraid to drag into his pulpit on the Sabbath; another one shuts up his church and takes a holiday. Unless Christ's ministers honor the day as it ought to be, it will soon fall into general dishonor and contempt.

Why should any pastor fail to find congenial themes to kindle his own soul, and to attract, and arouse, and edify his congregation? Surely on one day in three hundred and sixty-five he would be able to attune his heart to the melodies of praise. Let him open his psalter and note how many hundreds of its verses have the same jubilant refrain: "Praise ye the Lord;" "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord;" "Forget not all his benefits;" "Whoso offereth the sacrifice of thanksgiving, glorifieth me." Let him recall the many incidents of the past twelve-month that demand heartfelt gratitude. We do not praise God enough, either in the sanctuary or in our own homes. The apostle's injunction is, "In everything give thanks!" That is the true pitch for a rousing, warming, soul-lifting sermon to all sorts and conditions of people. Some have had a year of trials and bereavements; they need to be cheered up. Others are perplexed by mysterious providences; they need to be reminded that behind the clouds still reigns and shines the infinite Love. If the year has brought to some full barns and large bank deposits, it is a good time to exhort to large consecrations of "tithes of God's storehouse." Why should not every pulpit ring a loud peal of gratitude on one day in every year, and every sanctuary resound with strong and full chorus of happy voices? Nor should any prosperous family sit down to a feast of fat turkeys unless they have made some poor man's house warm, and his table to smoke with bounties.

* * *

Fellow Christians! let us make this Thanksgiving Day a day of devout jubilation; and send heavenward a glorious chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies! "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord."

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Socialist Vote This Year

The prediction that the Progressive movement would reduce the vote of the Socialists has not proven true. The returns for the minor parties always come in slowly but it now seems probable that the Socialist vote was doubled this year. The Chicago Daily World presents a table of the Socialist vote upon which we base our statistics. According to this journal the Socialists secured a million votes this year. Very few states in the union showed any diminution in the vote. The most striking loss the party suffered was in Massachusetts where the vote was only half this year what it was four years ago. On the other hand the largest gains were made in the Mississippi Valley. Ohio trebled its vote over four years ago. Illinois reports five times the Socialist vote of the previous national election. Indiana just about trebled its vote. There is a long list of states where the vote was doubled.

In Chicago the Socialists have come so near to electing their candidate for states' attorney that they are contesting the election. This was due to the division of the vote so equally among four candidates but is also a vote of protest indicating the measure of discontent with the way that office has been conducted in recent years. Chicago Socialists elected three men to the state legislature, Stedman, Madsen and Mason.

It must be taken into account, however, that the Socialist vote is more of a fluctuating quantity than in other parties. In Chicago in 1904 Debs received 47,000 votes. In 1908, in the same city he received 18,000 votes. In 1912, he received about fifty thousand votes. Many men who are not due-paying Socialists and who know comparatively little about the principles of the movement take this means of expressing discontent. Even with this interpretation, the Socialist vote this year is a most significant factor in our national life.

The only counter to Socialism in European countries, that is effective, is the liberal movement, represented in this country by the Progressive party. The liberal attitude towards political questions undertakes to adjust social wrongs without the sacrifice of individualism. It undertakes to conserve what is good in the old and adopt what is good in the new.

The Reform of Our Courts

The excitement about the judicial recall and the recall of decisions brings before us one of our greatest governmental problems, that of introducing common-sense into the decisions of courts.

In a western state, a man who had been indicted for a dastardly crime was set at liberty because his indictment read "against the peace and dignity of state" instead of "against the peace and dignity of the state." Recent examples of the perversion of justice on technicalities are as follows:

The Supreme Court of Florida reversed a conviction for grand larceny because the indictment charged the man with stealing a cow, whereas the evidence showed that the animal taken was a steer.

The South Carolina court set aside a similar conviction because the article actually stolen was not a piano, as the indictment specified, but a pianola.

The Ohio Supreme Court made a significant contribution, too, to legal metaphysics on June 28, 1910, when it gave its decision in the case of Goodlove vs. State. Goodlove was charged with killing a man in a drunken grawl and was convicted. The Supreme Court found when the case was appealed that the evidence did not make clear whether the victim's real name was Peter Stucky or Frank McCormick. There was no question of what the man known as Goodlove had done, nor that someone had lost life because of his drunken fury.

It is to the credit of President Taft that he has helped point out the evils in our present system. We need legislation both state and national to completely reform it. The judicial system we now have was brought into this country from England and at the time of the Revolutionary War passed over into the new regime with but little change.

Through our technicalities, we let the worst criminals get away. Through our injunctions, we set aside the executive and legislative functions of government. Through the antiquated assumption that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty, we place a needless burden upon the machinery of justice.

Dealing with Commercialized Vice

The state of Iowa is leading now in the handling of the monster problem of the social evil. They have two laws which make it possible for them to keep the underworld on the run although the latter works complacently and confidently in other communities.

The first of these laws is called the Abatement and Injunction law, which was introduced by George Cosson and is known as the Cosson law. By this measure any citizen may go into court and institute action in the name of the State of Iowa against the person conducting a house of illfame. A temporary injunction is taken out and if the evidence sustains the charge, a permanent injunction is issued and a tax of $400 is issued against the building. The injunction is against each inmate, the madam, the manager of the place, and the owner of the building. The result of the law is that no man rents his building for an evil purpose knowingly since the fines more than equal the gain.

The other law which has proven useful is the Removal Bill. This bill is a form of the recall which is now so widely advocated. The bill provides that one may file a suit in the district court of the county in which the defendant resides. The mayor, chief of police, all police officers including town marshalls, constables, county attorney, sheriff, supervisors or county commissioners are all subject to removal for wilful neglect or refusal to perform their official duties. The official who takes an attitude, such as many mayors of Chicago have taken of refusing to enforce state laws, are removed. Several such removals have taken place in the state of Iowa and the machinery operates swiftly and without expense to the man bringing the complaint.

The effect of such action is clear, as it relates to the social evil. Every state forbids houses of prostitution and yet in most states the mayors and officials establish segregated districts against the clear provisions of the law and against the oath of office they have taken.

Woman's Suffrage Makes Advances

Five states voted on woman's suffrage this fall and four of them voted favorably. They are Michigan, Kansas, Arizona and Oregon. The state which turned down suffrage is the home of Senator La-Follette, ardent suffragist, and the state of strong Socialist propensities. These two influences have not been sufficient to carry the day however, although the Roman Catholics of Wisconsin are said to desire suffrage to increase their strength against Socialism. The states which already had full suffrage were Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington and California. So far the suffrage movement has not crossed the Missouri River. It will find its chief difficulty in meeting the populations where there is large percentage of immigrants. These old country peoples have strong convictions about the place of woman in the social order which will not be readily displaced. The eastern states may also be depended upon to take the same conservative attitude they adopt towards every new idea.

Milk in Place of Beer

Milk bottles instead of beer bottles reign supreme at luncheon in the Pullman car factories. Two peddlers at the main gate, which is but one of the seven entrances, sell nearly half a thousand bottles of milk each noon.

Exclusion of demoralizing influences being part of the original paternalistic regime, no saloons, with but one exception, were allowed in the town. Liquor interests seized upon the nearest available spot and thirty grog shops soon clustered at Kensington, just across the railroad tracks and south of Pullman. This place quickly merited the name of "Bumtown," which still clings to it.

"With the changes in population and the property sale, which did away with the early restrictions," writes Graham Romeyn Taylor in The Survey, "saloons seem strangely slow in invading the old town. Aside from the hotel bar mentioned, only five saloons have started up, one of them in a corner of the market house. And in the part of the town north of the shops but ten have come in. In fact, few things are more striking to the observer who watches the swarms of men at the main gate during the noon hour, then the absence of beer cans and the prevalence of milk bottles. Bumtown, however, lives up to its old reputation and boasts of fifty-two saloons, twenty-five of which are on the single block nearest to Pullman.

Things Which Make for Peace

"The international mind" is a term employed by Dr. Nicolas Murray Butler to designate "that habit of thinking of foreign relations and business, and that habit of dealing with them, which regards the several nations of the civilized world as friendly and co-operating equals in aiding the progress of civilization, in developing commerce and industry, and in spreading enlightenment and culture throughout the world." This habit of thinking and acting will promote peace. Without it brute instincts will prevail in international relations.

The international mind is none other than the mind of Christ. Christ stands for the rights of all. The good of the race is the welfare of all, not the perfection of a few. A Christian statesman like Gladstone is sensitive to the needs of the weakest races. He knows the difference between bluster and braggadocio and patriotism. "When Secretary Hay said that American diplomacy had but two controlling maxims, the golden rule and the open door, he spoke with an international mind. The policy of swagger, that of swinging sticks, either big or little, and that of threatening to double or treble the military armaments and preparations of some other nation, are not compatible with the possession of an international mind."

There is need for the congregational mind in every church. Men become church bosses frequently when they think they are serving Christ. Their error is in not trusting the people. A church of Christ is a company of people that believe in each other's good sense and good intentions. A man of ability undertakes to control the church when he has no confidence in the sincerity and sense of his brethren. Where there is one purely selfish church tyrant there are a dozen who lack faith in the people. Lack of faith may be due to selfishness but nearly all church tyrants have streaks of unselfishness. They are so anxious to have every opinion right that they insist on doing all the thinking for the congregation.

Peace among the churches is secure only when faith and good will prevail. A peace that is brought about by ecclesiastical action is of no value unless the ecclesiastical action is a formality like a marriage ceremony for two persons who love each other and have sense enough to live together harmoniously. Differences of opinion and discussion are essential to progress. That we who call ourselves Disciples of Christ have animated debates on questions of faith and practice is evidence that we are growing. If we can cherish mutual esteem and confidence it will be proper to speak of ourselves as a brotherhood or as anything else that signifies unity. We must honor the old men who doubt the wisdom of certain changes in our customs and teaching. We must allow the young men to make their contribution to the common stock of knowledge and sentiment.

The nagging habit is as reprehensible in the church as it is in the home. We do not help people by fault-finding. In the partnership of the home the first aim is to enjoy together the best that any member can offer to the rest. Good workmanship, appreciation of the beautiful, admiration for noble deeds, good will toward all sorts and conditions of men—these are the first things in a good home. In the church we meet to symbolize in worship our faith and hope, to enlighten the mind by discussion, and to cultivate that friendship for God and man which we call religion. We are to receive each other, that is, accept as fellow Christians, but not to pass judgment on each other's thoughts. In friendliness we can discuss all the questions that relate to life and godliness. The emphasis must be upon the friendliness; if it is not, we are no better than "irksome, brawling scolds."

False notions of honor are responsible for many personal encounters and many wars between nations. We have learned that it is skill in fighting and not the right that wins in a duel. We have yet to learn that the heaviest battalion is not necessarily on the side of God. If a man is accused of dishonesty, he can silence his accusers only by honest dealing. Any statement he may make gets its value from what he does. Nations will be judged finally by the service they render and not by their readiness in picking quarrels. The honor of the church is advanced when it does the work it was established to do. By attention to its proper business it can teach men to attend to theirs and thus it will do the things which make for peace. [Midweek Service, Dec. 4., Rom. 14.]

The Evangelist Looking Himself in the Face

If a well-known pastor in the state of Indiana has read the symposium in one of our papers on modern evangelism, he will have abundant reason for rejoicing that what he said in a well-written paper on insane evangelism at a Disciples' Congress about five years ago, and suffered newspaper martyrdom for his boldness, has been said again by the evangelists themselves with more definiteness, and certainly with more approval, than he enjoyed. The fault with that now ancient paper on evangelism was not that it misrepresented any one, but that it wounded our pride; and we bespattered each other with printer's ink in our efforts to escape from the domestic unpleasantness in which his revelations found us. The author of the paper suffered most, as men do who have the habit of looking facts in the face, especially when the facts show a religious people in a condition where repentance and reformation of life are the only conditions of future salvation. It was easier to punish the author of the aforementioned paper than to reform, and churches, like humanity elsewhere, are prone to choose the line of least resistance.

But the pressure of public opinion has compelled even the evangelists to look themselves in the face, to see what they are doing and what they are not doing, and as a result they are writing of insane evangelism themselves. But we cannot refrain from saying that if our Indiana seer is aware of what is going on in evangelistic circles just now, he should hold on to his porch railing every time he steps out of doors the next few weeks, if he would prevent his translation, so great must be his satisfaction.

The Indiana pastor was somewhat in advance of his time; we could have built a penal fire for him then; there are those who in effect are building a memorial for him now. One editor thought him insane. It would seem that a host of competent witnesses think him altogether sane, for they are saying what he said, only with less considerateness and courtesy. The evangelists bring accusations against each other which are more damaging than anything charged by their critics.

When that discussion was on it will be recalled that a well-known Bible teacher affirmed that the speaker at the Congress had no right to criticize the noted evangelists and their methods, because he had never held a great meeting himself. If such a rule as that prevailed in the world no man could criticize a sermon unless he had preached one; no man could criticize a book unless he had written one; no evangelist who had held a meeting with one hundred additions would have the right to criticize an evangelist whose meetings ran into the five hundreds; no man could pass judgment upon a house unless he had built one, nor upon the freshness of an egg unless he had laid one. The majority of sentiments expressed were adverse to the paper on insane evangelism. But today who was right, the author of the paper or his critics? Time has demonstrated the fact that current evangelism, dragged to the light, has found fewer and fewer apologists, until today its circle of friends is ready to repudiate it.

It has been the habit of defenders of popular evangelistic practices to characterize those who ventured to disapprove of these practices as "disgruntled pastors", or "higher critics", who were bent on destroying the evangelists and their work, and almost everything else destructible in the universe; or "knockers" who knocked from long established habits, and who rejoiced at the sound of their hammers; or they were some specimen of humanity worthy of the scorn of those godly men whose sole ambition was to convert the world—anything to stave off the day when objectionable methods would be hailed before the judgment seat of an enlightened public opinion. The method of procedure was as firmly established as are the hills. When complaints were made, some well-known evangelist whose methods were not as culpable as many others of the class, was put forward to enter a general denial and call for specifications, knowing full well that they could not be given without seriously embarrassing our entire household of faith. The silence of the disaffected persons was construed as a victory for prevailing evangelism; the spokesman for the evangelistic community threw his hat in the air, metaphorically speaking, heralded abroad the tidings that another assault had been repulsed, and a calumniator silenced for all time.

But what shall be said now when all that was ever charged by the critics is now said more sharply by the evangelists themselves? If it is proper for the evangelists to expose the wrongs of their profession today, it must have been better to expose them several years ago; if the critics were wrong then, what makes evangelistic critics right now? But we forbear. It is not our desire to press such questions, only to rejoice with the evangelists in the good work they are beginning to do in the recovery of their work from the hands of the spoiler.

The evangelists are generally agreed that something must be done to restore evangelism to its proper place. They feel as do thousands of others who are interested, though not actively engaged in that field of endeavor, that despite astounding telegraphic reports of success, there is something wrong between the statistics of conversions and the stability of the converts; that there is a great gulf between the figures of the faithful and the faithful of the figures; that the numbers count for more in the press than they do in the pew; that it is a debatable question at times whether the revival was held for the benefit of the church or the benefit of the evangelist, whether the evangelist served the community or was ministered to by it.

In another article we shall say something more on this subject, meanwhile congratulating our brethren, the evangelists, upon their ability to look themselves in the face, an accomplishment which is really a work of grace. No cause worth saving has anything to fear from facing the facts. E. B. B.

History of the Little Brown Church

There are in this song the elements of popularity, possibly because a majority of those who sing the song have been reared in communities where the church life was suggestive of life as it must be in "the little brown church." It may be interesting to our readers to know something of its history which we glean from The Congregationalist:

Some forty or fifty years ago a song known as The Little Brown Church in the Vale caught the popular fancy and literally went around the world. The president of the National Music Teachers' Association belonging to a sturdy Scotch family used to join heartily with his seven brothers in singing the song with no thought that any particular church was meant. Later he was astonished to learn that the veritable "Little Brown Church" was not far from his Iowa home. It is a read church, a Congregational church, and is at Bradford in Northern Iowa. Some pioneers in Northern Iowa met for worship in a log house for some time and finally organized a church. In 1859 Rev. J. N. Nutting became pastor and it was determined to erect a house of worship. This required much sacrifice for all were poor and there was, actually, almost no money in circulation. Those sturdy farmers made the frame from timber growing along the Cedar River. The boards for the siding and what hardware was used had to be hauled over corduroy roads and through swamps from McGregor, sixty miles away. The dedication was a great event. Many people drove forty miles to be present. The church prospered and soon after Bradford Academy was erected so that the community became an educational and religious center. When the railroad came, it ran on the opposite side of the river. Nashua sprang up and gradually the people moved to the new town and Bradford disappeared from the map. The academy building is going to decay, but sentiment has prompted the pepole to preserve "The Little Brown Church," and it is in a good state of repair. Dr. W. S. Pitts was one of the pioneers that came under the influence of this church in the early days and he did more than any one else to make it known by his famous song. In many of the conventions of the Men and Religion Forward Movement in the Middle West this song was sung at nearly every session and it bids fair to become as popular as in former years, emphasizing as it does the fact that this new movement is not outside of the church but within it, and that among the most cherished memories of childhood is the recollection of going to church, often to a humble church in the country.

The Second Quadrennial Council

Chicago is to be host to the Second Quadrennial Council of the Churches of Christ in America, December 4-10. Thirty-two denominations, representing over seventeen million communicants, are to be represented officially by five hundred delegates.

No other organization has ever stood so completely for united Protestantism, and it is not too much to say that in the interests of Christian unity the convention will be the most important gathering ever held on American soil.

The invitation to the Federal Council to meet in Chicago was given at a union meeting of the ministerial bodies. The Chicago Association of Commerce joined in the invitation. The city desires to be a royal host, and the co-operation of every church and pastor is requested. The business sessions of the Council, to be held in the assembly room of the La Salle Hotel, as well as the more popular meetings, are to be open to all.

The programme, as at present oulined, begins with a reception in the Art Institute, Wednseday evening, December 4. Bishop E. R. Hendrix, the national president, will speak in Fullerton Hall, which is a part of the Art Institute, and the ladies will serve in the galleries.

The Thursday evening meeting will be held in Orchestra Hall. Bishop Francis J. McConnell of Denver, and Dr. J. A. MacDonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, Toronto, Canada, will be the speakers.

On Friday evening, there will be a rally of Young People's organizations in the Second Presbyterian Church, one of the largest in Chicago, and centrally located. Dr. John Balcom Shaw, president of the Committee of One Hundred, which has the arrangements of the Council in charge, is pastor of this great church. Governor Marshall of Indiana, vice-president-elect of the United States, will be one of the speakers. Governor Marsholl will attend the meeting of the Council as one of the regularly elected delegates from the Presbyterian denomination. Dr. Wilbur F. Sheridan, general secretary of the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and others will also speak. Mr. R. H. Gardiner, former president of the Brotherhood of St Andrew, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, will preside

Sunday afternoon, a meeting in the interest of social service will be held in the Olympic Theatre. Williams Jennings Bryan and Professor Walter Rauschenbush will speak. In the evening, group meetings will be held in various parts of the city, and Dr. George H. Ferris, of Philadelphia, will address the Sunday Evening Club in Orchestra Hall as a part of the regular program of the Council meeting.

Monday evening, the social unions and church clubs will unite in a banquet at the La Salle Hotel.

Among the representative speakers who will have part in the council meeting are Dr. Mark A. Mathews, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly; Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, moderator of the Congregational Council; Dr. A. F. Fitch, president of Andover Theological Seminary; Bishop J. W. Hamilton, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Dr. George B. Stuart, president Auburn Theological Seminary; Bishop William C. Doane, Protestant Episcopal bishop of the diocese of Auburn, N. Y.; Dr. Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, representing the Church of Disciples and Dr. W. H. Roberts, chairman of the executive committee of the Federal Council.

Gratitude

"Do you give thanks for this?—or that?
No, God be thanked
I am not grateful
In that cold, calculating way with blessings ranked
As one, two, three and four—that would be hateful.

I only know that every day brings good above
My poor deserving;
I only feel that in the road of Life true Love
Is leading me along and never swerving.

Whatever gifts and mercies to my lot may fall,
I would not measure
As worth a certain price in praise, or great or small;
But take and use them all with simple pleasure.

For when we gladly eat our daily bread, we bless
The Hand that feeds us;
And when we tread the road of Life in cheerfulness,
Our very heart-beats praise the Love that leads us.

—Henry van Dyke.

New--Old Plymouth

As the Wayfarer Discovered It

YES, THAT'S IT," said the native; "it does seem kind of a pity to turn a live rock into a dead monoment, don't it. But, ye see, if it hadn't a been done, all these 'ere summer tourists would a chipped the thing to bits by this time."

When he said "summer tourists," there was such scorn in his tone as one uses toward an inferior race of beings. Still, the summer visitor is rather necessary, after all, and one must keep an eye to business; therefore he added indulgently: "Folks likes a souvenir mighty well, ye know." It was many years since the Wayfarer had visited old Plymouth and she was not prepared for the wrought-iron gates which now protect Plymouth Rock from patriotic vandals. Too bad the American at home or abroad shows such a propensity for carving his name everywhere and "chipping things." It has shut him out of some interesting places in Europe and now it has caged up his own Plymouth Rock. In the old days there was something impressive about the smooth, rounded granite, and the act of setting foot upon it. One's imagination easily conjured up the scene of the landing and saw the men in boots holding the small boat steady as one after another sprang ashore on the rock—Mary Chilton first. Now the imagination works with more difficulty. But, after all, it is Plymouth Rock, and the date "1620" cut on its side gives the traveler something of a thrill, particularly if he has come from afar to visit the scene of our national beginnings.

"Like to drive up to the Pilgrim Monoment?" asked the scorner of summer tourists. "This was the fust street laid out," said he, as we rattled along, "most likely you rec'lect how their log houses was set. There's where their common house was and the fust meetin'-house stood here, on top o' which Myles Standish set his cannon."

"Yes, them are beautiful ellums, English ellums, planted by the Pilgrims. They brought the seed from their old home. One or two has had to be replaced, ye see."

The Wayfarer felt a sudden thrill of kinship with those stern old Puritans. After all, they cared for beauty as well as for religious freedom, and the same love of their old home, of the place wherein they originated, which brings Americans from all over the country back to Plymouth made the first settlers plant elm trees from English seed.

Alighted at the monument erected on the hill to the memory of those first settlers, the visitor reads the list of familiar names: Bradford, Winslow, Standish, Alden, Howland, Brewster, Carver and the rest. In white marble bas-relief one sees depicted the signing of the compact in the cabin of the "Mayflower," and other momentous scenes of those first days in New England. But the Wayfarer had had enough of monuments, no matter how fine, and of guides, no matter how accurate and quaint. Somehow they do not aid imagination. The visitor will do well to wander by himself among the mounds of Burial Hill, for nowhere will his admiration for that sturdy company of immigrants wax stronger. There he will realize what the privations and hardships of that first American winter meant; for there he will remember how the hill became more thickly populated as the little company in the log houses diminished. He will remember how the living planted corn among the graves that its waving blades might hide them from the Indian and so disguise their losses—and yet they were willing to remain. Yes, it is to be wondered at that they did not all return when the "Mayflower" weighed anchor and sailed back to England.

The Canopy Over the Historic Rock.

None of the original tombstones remains, yet Burial Hill is eloquent. The thought of the corn and all that the success of that first crop meant to the half-starved settlers instantly calls up a pleasanter scene—the first Thanksgiving Day in Plymouth, with the devout service of gratitude in the meeting-house, afterward the sports and races in real holiday spirit, and the baking and brewing for the feast when Indian and white man sat down together. Over yonder are the cranberry bogs and the low, marshy lands where the ducks and wild turkeys were shot. A genuine feast it was, we are told, for the tables were filled for once, at least, with broth and oysters and roasts of various kinds, with venison pasties, cakes and "manchets;" bowls of salad, and great baskets of grapes and plums. It really does one good to think about it and remember that, at least, on Thanksgiving Day the hungry Pilgrims were fed.

Within Pilgrim Hall are many interesting things to be seen, each one of which suggests a picture. The long toasting-forks, the warming-pans, the kettles and cranes, make the huge fireplaces in those log-cabins very real; and one sees how decidedly the life indoors centered around the blazing logs. The sound of the axe must have been almost unceasing in those bitter winter days, and the toil of the women within doors unending, as they baked and brewed and turned the roast on the spit.

The sight of Governor Bradford's arm chair suggests the problems of discipline and government in the new colony and the precedents then established to survive through the many years of change and growth. The Peregrine White wooden cradle made the Wayfarer ache with the thought of a baby trying to find warmth and shelter in that desolate settlement, and of the mother in her weakness struggling against such hardships. No one can see a spinning-wheel in Plymouth without thinking of Priscilla and that first romance on the Pilgrim shore. Yet all the women must have spun. Just so, though all the men must have carried arms, the sight of any weapon brings first to mind the sturdy figure of Myles Standish as he drilled his men, and primed his guns and intimidated over-bold Indians. So warlike and fierce toward the enemy, so knightly and tender toward the gentle Rose that faded by his side in the harsh air of New England! Across the bay stands his monument on Captain's Hill overlooking the pleasant "plantation" in Duxbury which he chose for his home. He looks a little lonely on top of the tall shaft; and does he turn a little wistfully toward that cottage yonder where Priscilla made a home for John Alden?

No visit to Plymouth is really complete without sailing over to Clark's Island, where the Pilgrims spent their first Sunday, and visiting Duxbury and the old Standish and Alden houses. The Wayfarer well remembers how as a child she once held in her hand the heavy key to Myles Standish's house while the dearest and daintiest of old ladies—his seventh descendant—told tales of the early days and directed her to the small burying-ground in the woods where three, three-cornered stones mark the grave of the doughty soldier.

Clark's Island, Plymouth Harbor. Here the Pilgrim Fathers Spent Their First American Sunday.

Duxbury does well to cherish the tombstones and the old houses; Plymouth to protect her Rock and "ellums," and to keep her relics of 1620. In spite of change and progress, of hotel and shop and factory; of noisy motor-car and train, they keep alive the glamor of old-time memories, a glamor which all who have visited Plymouth will understand.

The New Campanile

"May you live as long as the Campanile" had been for hundreds of years a birthday greeting not only for the citizens of Venice but also for the peasants of the Venetian province. "Il sior Beppo," as he was then affectionately called, and now better known as his holiness Pius X., used to encourage his patients when on a sick visit with, "Well, but the Campanile is standing yet, and you must try to do the same."

It was a terrible shock to "Sior Beppo," and every one within forty miles of Venice, when, on July 14, 1902, without a moment's warning, the Campanile suddenly collapsed, like an aged telescope, and all to be seen of the proud landmark was a monument of dust and fragments, says a writer in the London Express. "Sior Beppo" was in his study quite close to St. Mark's Square, and heard the clash and dying groan of his beloved bells. He immediately went out to the square, without waiting for his hat, and when he saw the ruin he exclaimed: "But it must rise again."

In this remark came out the true Venetian. Within forty-eight hours of the catastrophe the town council of Venice had decided that the Campanile should be rebuilt exactly as it was before. While the whole world regretted that the characteristic Loggia of Sansovino had disappeared in a dusty heap, the Venetians felt that an integral part of their daily life had crumbled away. The tower was to them a token of the glorious past.

Begun in the ninth century after Christ, it was completed in the sixteenth, when Venice was at the zenith of her power, the indisputable master of the Mediterranean, the conqueror of Genoa, the sovereign lord of Padua, the colonizer of the challenger of the Osmanli power.

For hundreds of years the peasants for miles around had regarded the Campanile as an hour-glass for them. Through all the joys and sorrows of the republic the bells had rung out to tell them the news—a doge dead or a new one elected; a pope passed away or a successor created; a great condottieri or an admiral returned in triumph—it was all the same to them. They knew which bell was ringing and the news it conveyed, for there were five bells, and each one had a duty laid down by the law of the council.

It was no wonder, then, that on that fateful summer day in 1902, when the bells were no longer heard, the peasants left the fields and the shop hands their tools and hurried into Venice to see what had silenced their monitors. When they saw the pile of ruins and the "Marangona," the only bell preserved, on top of it, they sat down and cried, and then hurried to "Sior Beppo" at his palace and asked him to bless them, for they thought, with the destruction of their bells, that the end of the world had come.

In rebuilding the tower the original foundations have not been removed, though they have been greatly strengthened. Legend had always said that the foundations of the tower went down as far underneath the soil as the tower itself rose above. But, as a matter of fact, the foundations only went down about seventy feet, whereas the height, including the golden angel on top, is 352 feet. There is no doubt that the downfall of the tower was caused by faulty construction.

It was found that the main base to carry the weight was composed of large bricks collected from the old Roman city of Aquilleia, strengthened by cement of white lime from Istria. The foundations have now been much enlarged in order to allow of a wider distribution of weight on the greater surface, and the whole building has been strengthened by iron girders binding the masses together.

The only bell saved was "Marangona," but the pope had the other four recast and has presented them to the Campanile. When the foundation stone was laid on April 25, 1903, Cardinal Sarto promised Gaetano Moretti, as he then was, that he would himself attend to bless the inauguration of the bells. But fate has decreed otherwise, and the greatest Venetian of them all, who did more to bring about the quick resurrection of the Campanile, will be obliged to sit in his study and hear his beloved bells ring by the aid of the telephone or the gramophone.

He said to Gaetano Moretti the other day, speaking with tears in his eyes, "I promised you I would come, but, alas, I cannot. But I will sit here, and when I am tired I will tell them to turn on the machine, and I shall close my eyes and, in spite of the tiny noise, dream that I am back by my loved lagoons."

Ah, Sior Beppo, che tragedia!—Exchange.

Morning Prayer

Let me be faithful, Lord. If any friend
  Seeks the poor comfort of my guiding hand,
Or falters to my threshold for relief,
  Let me give all his longing may demand.

Let me be fearless, Lord. If any foe
  Flings my best idol to the sordid dust,
Or breaks the dream I love the best on earth,
  Let me arise, and clothe my soul with trust.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly.

The Green-Girdled Islands.

It was a most unusual hour at which the stewards called us on the morning of Thursday October 3. But it was none too early for when I stepped out on deck we were but a short distance from land and one of the officers told me that the rock we were approaching was Diamond Head, a short distance down the beach from the harbor of Honolulu.

But there were many preliminaries before the Tenyo Maru was permitted to come to the dock. The Hawaiian Islands are now a part of the United States, and the same quarantine precautions are taken there as at any other of our ports. The little launch of the harbor physician was soon sighted, with its yellow flag at the bow, and the Stars and Stripes at the stern. He came on board, examined the ship's list, inspected the steerage and the second cabin people, and even lined up the first cabin passengers on the main deck and asked them to hold out their hands for examination as he passed along. It appears that special precautions are taken against leprosy at this port.

View of Landscape.

In the meantime we were enjoying the beautiful view afforded us of the harbor, the city, whose modern and business-like structures were almost hidden by the trees that line every street, the low-lying shore, covered with rice fields and orchards, and the hills, steeply rising to mountains back of the city. The intense green of the shore as it stretched away in either direction, brought to mind the lines of Joaquin Miller;

> "Asleep in the sun lay the green-girdled isles,
> As rocked to their rest in the cradle of God."

To be sure we saw only one out of the eight Hawaiian Islands. And the one we saw, Oahu, whose port of Honolulu is the capital and metropolis of the group, is not the largest of them. On the neighboring island of Hawaii, which gives its name to all, there rise the two tall volcanic peaks of Mouna Loa and Mauna Kea, which constitute the most impressive natural feature of the islands, while on the Island of Molokai there is the leper colony to which Father Damien gave his long service and at last his life.

Historical Interests Center Here.

But so far apart are these dots on the surface of the Pacific that although they look very close together on the map, it is a considerable journey for ships to travel from one to another of the group, and we saw only the single island of Oahu. But it is with this one that the historical interests of the entire eight are chiefly concerned. Here Captain Cook, the explorer, came in the seventeenth century, and named the entire series the Sandwich Islands, in honor of his patron, the Earl of Sandwich. Here in 1795 Kamahamaha landed with his warriors from Hawaii, and defeated the natives in a conflict whose scene is still pointed out at the Pali, or cliff, back of Honolulu, to the edge of which he drove the fugitives and hurled them to the rocks, far below.

From that time till recently the islands were under the rule of a dynasty of which Kamahamaha was the founder, and which included five kings of the same name. In 1873, when the second constitution was given the islands, the legislature named as king, Lunalilo, and in 1874 the same body elected David Kalikawa king. On his death in 1881 his sister, Liliokuolani, was made queen. But three years later the republic was proclaimed, and Sanford B. Dole was made governor. In 1897 the islands were annexed to the United States, and in 1900 were given a territorial form of government, and Gov. Dole was made president. He is now a venerable figure in the city, a judge in the United States court, and Gov. Freer is at the head of affairs.

Conversion of Islands to Christianity.

The story of the conversion of the Hawaiian Islands to Christianity is one of the romances of missions. In 1819 the first American missionaries landed on Oahu. The abandonment of the old animistic and idolatrous religion of the people was rapid and complete, though not without desperate resistance on the part of the older priesthood. The worship of Pele, the goddess of fire, was given its death blow in 1824, when Princess Kapiolani of Hilo defied the goddess and her priests at the very edge of the crater, ate the berries sacred to Pele, and hurled stones into the fiery chasm of the volcano. This courageous act, in defence of the new faith, forms one of the episodes in the pageant of "Darkness and Light" to be given in connection with the great missionary exposition to be given in Chicago next spring.

Our day in Honolulu was made delightful by the attentions of a group of University of Chicago friends. Dr. S. D. Barnes, a prominent physician of the city, gathered a few former university people together and did the honors of the occasion as a most thoughtful and devoted host. We were taken in automobiles to the markets, where the strange looking fish are brought in very morning from the fleets far out at sea, and the almost tropical fruits and flowers of the islands; to the precipice of Pali some six miles up the mountain road, where the hero of Hawaii drove his foes to their destruction; to some of the schools, where the strange mixture of races was the most striking feature; to some of the homes of our friends, where we had a chance to see something of the home life of the city; and then to the University Club.

A Home University Reception.

There we had a University of Chicago luncheon, with the maroon in evidence in ribbons and flowers. A dozen or more guests enjoyed the two hours spent in good fellowship. We met a number of most interesting people, and counted the event a delightful episode in our journey. Dr. Doremus Scudder, well known as the pastor of Central Union Church, is one of the enthusiastic exponents of the missionary idea. His church is said to give more for missions in proportion to its membership than any other church in the world. Rev. A. A. Ebersole, Chicago '99, is his associate. Mr. Riley H. Allen, editor of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, is an '04 man. Dr. Barnes goes back to '94, and played on the earliest athletic teams of the university.

The Disciples have a church in Honolulu which was organized in 1892 by T. D. Garvin. The present pastor is David C. Peters, who, however, was back in the States on a visit when we were there, so that we failed to see him. The church numbers about one hundred and sixty-five members, and is spoken of as a fine company of people. It was with regret that we missed the opportunity of meeting the members of this congregation.

Places of Resort in Honolulu.

One of the lovely places of resort in the vicinity of the city is Waikiki Beach, some three miles down the coast toward the Diamond Head. One takes an electric car that traverses an avenue on which are the government buildings, the first church built in Honolulu, the first residence, following the period of the old native huts, and other interesting structures. Everywhere the flowers are seen in wonderful richness and variety; the flaming hibiscus, the purple bougainvillia in masses that seem incredible, hedges of night-blooming cereos that would be miracles of loveliness in any other place, and trees of tropical and semi-tropical luxuriance from the oriental palm to the northern cedar. Then on through flooded rice fields and banana plantations the car proceeds to the Aquarium, one of the most interesting in the world, and the Moana Hotel, with the broad bathing beach back of it.

There we had one of the most fascinating experiences to be imagined. The waves come rolling in upon a beach which is matchless for smoothness and protection. Far out toward the sea the coral reefs keep the sharks from approaching, and leave the tumbling waves to the possession of the bathers. And here the two sports of the Hawaiian swimmers are to be seen in their perfection, surf riding and canoeing with the outrigger canoes. The first is done with a broad, pointed board, which the bather takes out till he meets an advancing wave. Then lightly mounting it, he stands on the board,

From Scrooby to Plymouth Rock

By B. H. van Breemen

IN THE YEAR 1604, John Robinson, a graduate of Cambridge University, became the pastor of a flock of Independents in the little town of Scrooby. These Independents, who should not be confused with the Puritans, held much the same ideas in church government as did the Anabaptists. "It was in and around Norwich, where the Dutch Anabaptists were most numerous, that the Independents first, under Robert Browne, took their rise. Hence they were called Brownists. The members of the first church of these Independents, formed in London in 1592, were promptly clapped into prison. Then their three leaders, Barrowe, Greenwood and Perry, were put to death. England with her political church, was determined not to tolerate 'heresy.' Scores of other heretics of the same sort were beheaded, hanged, or died in the filthy prisons."

The Asylum in Liberty-Loving Holland.

When Davison, Queen Elizabeth's secretary of state, during the early reign of that sovereign visited Holland, he was accompanied by a youthful citizen of Scrooby, named William Brewster. This Brewster, later a member of the Scrooby Church and master of a post-office (for the king's messengers) in the manor house of the archbishops of York, advised his brethren in the faith to go "where they knew religion was free for all men"—to the Dutch republic! For by that time it had become known far abroad, that the Dutch government, leading all Europe in toleration and religious liberty, had to the English, French, Italian and other Protestants granted houses of worship free of rent or taxes, and that in most cases it paid the salaries of the ministers. In at least twenty-three towns or cities of the Netherlands there were churches of English-speaking people. Those of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Flushing still remain. "The relations between the Netherlands and England," says the author of "Brave Little Holland," "were in every way closer and more friendly than they have ever been since. Soldiers by the tens of thousands, merchants, sailors, clergymen, exiles and refugees by the thousands, visited or lived in Holland and in other Dutch states. Many of them had their wives and children with them. Among the most touching inscriptions on the tombs in the Dutch churches and cemeteries are those in memory of English wives, sweethearts and children. Probably an average of 12,000 English-speaking people lived in the Low Countries from 1580 to 1640, the great majority being in the republic. The Scottish Presbyterian Church in Rotterdam celebrated its quarter millennial anniversary Sept. 14, 1893."

It was to this cradle of religious freedom that the Scrooby Pilgrims set sail, settling first at Amsterdam (where there is yet a narrow street called "Brownistengang," or Brownist alley) and later at Leiden. Besides the bronze tablet erected by the Council of the Congregational Churches in America in the wall of St. Peter's Church to the memory of the Pilgrim fathers and their pastor, the stranger who visits the town of the heroic siege will find in the Klok Steeg (Bell Alley) a stone, erected in 1865, with the words: "On this spot lived, taught, and died John Robinson, 1611-1625."

In this house the Pilgrims, about 300 in number, held their meetings, using the parlor or chief room for preaching and worship. For they believed in separation of church and state, differing in their ideas of church government from the Puritans and the members of the English and Scottish Church (of which Rev. Robert Durie was pastor and in which were 130 English-speaking families). For this reason, and also because they would not worship in edifices once used by Roman Catholics, they did not follow the example of their other countrymen, who used the old chapel of the Veiled Nun's Cloister; nor accept a free house of worship from the government, which, though tolerant, did not allow any other congregations but those of the Calvinistic state church to have places of worship that showed by their outside appearance the purpose for which they were built.

Life in Holland.

Thus the Pilgrims were Separatists even in their new fatherland, though socially friendly with the members of the other English churches and with the British soldiers like Myles Standish and the hundreds of English-speaking merchants, weavers and mechanics.

Working at several trades, their children going to the Dutch schools and learning the Dutch language, the Pilgrims soon became sufficiently prosperous to buy the above-mentioned house for their pastor, besides erecting twenty-one small houses for their families in Bell Alley. Several of the leading men paid extra taxes and became citizens of Leiden. "This," says Griffith, "gave them a great experience in politics. They learned the ways of a republic and how to build one in America. The young men and boys learned all about union and secession, state-right and central power, and much about government, during their stay in Leiden. The trumpets and drums of war were quiet, but the placards and political advertisements, pasted upon the pumps, walls, bridges, and curbstones, told how excited the adherents of Maurice and Barneveldt were. On one occasion they saw Broad St. in front of the city hall barricaded, and the Arminians intrenched in a kind of fort against the Calvinists. For a time it looked as if there would be fighting in the streets of Leiden between the Waardgelders (or city guards) and the national troops."

Robinson and his flock favored Calvinism and the democratic principles as against the Arminian theology and state rights. Robinson publicly debated with Arminius' successor Episcopius; he especially approved of the post acta of the Synod of Dordrecht, by which provision was made for the right relations between ministers and magistrates, for education, foreign missions, etc.

Robinson and Brewster (who taught Latin and later had a printing office), with a view to securing greater privileges, became mem-

The Divide

By Leroy H. White.

Upon the lofty mountain crest
Fair Isa's limpid waters rest;
Set high upon the great divide
From whence the rippling brooklets glide,
Two outlets to this lake are found,
And hence the name, "Two Ocean Pond;"
For through one outlet waters flow
To the Pacific far below;
While through the other outlet go
The waters of the melting snow;
And down the eastern slope descend
To reach Atlantic's wave-swept strand.

A drop of water floating round
The surface of this mountain pond—
Ah! who can tell or who foresee
What things may change its destiny?
A breath of wind—a splash of rain—
The movement of a fish's fin
May give the start and fix the trend
On which the future may depend;
For started once upon its course—
Whether for better or for worse—
It onward flows from day to day
Along the same unchanging way.

Oh, what a parable is here
To teach a lesson plain and clear!
To every life there comes a day
Which marks the parting of the way.
Life has its crest and its divide;
Life has its moments which decide
The slope on which its currents flow,
Whether it be for weal or woe.
And man may choose—and man must choose—
Whether the prize to win or lose;
Whether the slope of life and peace
Which leads to realms of endless bliss;
Or whether the slope which downward goes
To endless death and endless woes.

There's many a man on life's divide
With hesitant look to either side,
Whose weal for eternity's day may hinge
Upon what may seem the smallest of things.
A little less doubt—a little more faith—
A little more thought on the heavenly path—
A little less hate—a little more love—
A little more longing for heaven above—
A little more striving the Tempter to quell—
A little more effort to turn the will—
And the face will be set toward the heavenly rest—
Toward all that is grandest and sweetest and best.

Yes, small the beginning and easy to choose;
But great the result—if we win—if we lose—
And happy is he, yes, happy, indeed,
Who the lesson will learn and earnestly heed.

bers of the university. This institution of learning had by this time become so famous that English-speaking students began to come to Leiden by the hundreds. After the closing of the English universities to Nonconformists and the "Great Ejectment" of 1662, this number increased considerably. Most of the Nonconformist English ministers were educated at Leiden.

From Dutch to American Republic.

When we follow the mighty current of the Reformation, whose often bloody waters were swelled from so many and different sources, we see at a certain point a little side-stream separate itself and take its own course. We have traced that little stream from Scrooby to the lowlands of the Dutch Republic. Let us follow it now from the land of freedom and toleration to the land of the free; from the republic of the united Netherlands to the soil destined to be the dominion of the glorious republic of the United States of North America.

In the summer of 1620, considering the fact that that year was the last one of the twelve of truce with Spain, Robinson began to realize his long-fostered plans of emigration to America. In January of said year he had contemplated a settlement among the Dutch on Manhattan Island, securing the assistance of the West India Company. The Dutch government, however, declaring itself unable to furnish sufficient protection against Spanish privateers during the voyage, this plan had proved unpracticable.

It was not only the fact that continuance of war was imminent which made the worthy pastor turn his eyes toward the new world. He, Bradford, and some others, saw the growing hollandization of the younger part of their company. They wanted to be Separatists to the end, and though the majority of the Dutchmen were orthodox in their religion, they had a far more liberal idea of Sabbath-keeping than the Pilgrims could approve. So the plans of emigration were laid, and by means of the help of the brethren in England, secured after much traveling to and fro, the sum needed for a settlement in Virginia was at last complete.

We know how the Pilgrim fathers chartered the ship "Speedwell;" how the younger and stronger members of the congregation left Leiden, July 21, 1620; how they were joined in Southampton by the "Mayflower" party; how, after having left Dartmouth, the "Speedwell" proved unseaworthy, and how only the strongest and healthiest of the united company, crowded in the larger and stronger ship, sailed for the new world. The only additionally noteworthy fact is that "at least one-third of the company was boys and girls, most of whom had been born in Holland."

They landed, as is well known, the twenty-first of December, and on Christmas Day began to build their homes.

So at the time when the Act of Uniformity, driving out the Nonconformists by the thousands, established in old England the power of Episcopalianism, far over the sea a New England began to arise, where the foundations were laid for a "free church in a free state."

"In 1643," says the author already quoted, after the example of the United States of Netherland, and most probably suggested by the Plymouth men, the New Englanders formed a confederation, of which Massachusetts was the Holland, or prepondering member. Later the Plymouth, or Old Colony, was swallowed up in the Bay or Massachusetts Colony. After that, in common American ideas and history, the Pilgrims, although they had imbibed the Dutch spirit of toleration in religion, and had practiced them by having fellowship with Myles Standish, the Roman Catholic, Roger Williams, the radical, and John Alden, the Irishman, were confounded with the Puritans. Only of late has the distinction been popularly made between the Separatists and the men who united church and state."

Turning back on our steps, we go from Plymouth to Dartmouth and Southampton, and via Amsterdam and Leiden to Scrooby and London. It certainly is with "more than a friendly thought," that we have been present in the spirit at the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the "Great Ejectment;" and with all our heart we will give more than our prayers to help our brethren over the sea win their fight against the enslaving powers of state-churchism and Puseyism, which strive after far more than "the best people in the Anglican Church" may suspect.

Wall St. Gives Scrubwomen a Raise

Pioneer work in behalf of the women office cleaners working in lower Manhattan has been carried on for four months by the Riverside Improvement Association of Brooklyn. The results of this campaign show what can be done by presenting to those who are directly concerned with an industry that is underpaid, a convincing collection of facts that had hitherto been neglected or unnoticed.

"A letter and report containing the important facts brought out by an inquiry," says the Survey, "were sent to the persons in charge of the buildings in which conditions seemed to warrant an advanced standard of pay. In eight buildings the pay ran from $4.32 to $4.75. In thirty-three the weekly pay was $5; in two, $5.50; in six, $6.

"Now, viewed from the angle of the whole range of philanthropic and civic bodies in the greater city, the Riverside Improvement Association is an obscure and modest organization. But the Riverside Improvement Association has an impressive ring to it, and its letter-heads made a doughty showing when they found their way to the desks high up in the big buildings.

"The board of managers in four buildings immediately authorized a raise of pay, two from $5 to $5.50 and two from $5 to $6. In four others the superintendents expressed their intention of taking the matter up with the owners and were hopeful of success. In all, about 200 women have already benefited."

What Real Poverty Means

While exploring the city of Damascus on a gloomy evening, a young American paused where two alleys met, and chanced to observe a glow of light in the shadows near by. Further examination proved that it came from the heating furnace of one of the baths of the city. In "Going Down From Jerusalem" Mr. Norman Duncan tells the pathetic little history revealed by his investigation.

The light issued from the end of the lane, which terminated in an underground chamber, to which it fell by way of a broken stairway of broad stones.

Here was an old man, as instantly appeared from the quality of his voice, being lifted timidly to demand what presence disturbed him; an old, old man, lying outstretched on his belly upon a heap of chopped straw at the little round mouth of the furnace, which was no more than a hole in the wall.

He was employed, it seemed, in thrusting the straw through the aperture, a handful at a time, so that it fell, a continuous stream, upon the fire below. The old man was lying quite alone in the dark. The place was hot and dusty and most foul to smell.

"It is a wretched labor," said the younger khawaja.

"Not so," answered the old man; "it is a labor for which I thank God, since, though I am old, I am not yet turned beggar."

The khawaja would know the reward.

"Sufficient to my small need," was the reply.

Sixpence a day!

"Have you no helper?"

"There are little children hereabout, who play at pushing straw through the hole; and they give me rest in the day, sometimes."

"What!" cried the khawaja. "You labor by night and by day?"

"Truly, khawaja, with much thankfulness to God for the opportunity. I must be diligent lest trouble befall me."

"What trouble menaces?" asked the khawaja.

"The keeper of the baths," was the answer, "might turn me off."

"Have you no sleep at all?"

"When the fire is hot," said the old man, "I may sleep a little; and sometimes I forget myself and sleep against my will."

"How long," demanded the khawaja, "have you lain here?"

"Since before I went blind of this dust."

"The number of these years?"

"God has privileged me with the favor of the bathkeeper for these eight years."

"Friend," inquired the khawaja, amazed, "do you dwell content with your lot?"

"Thanks be to God!" the old man replied.

The khawaja gave the old man a gold piece, and must then all at once take to his heels to escape the agony of gratitude.

Dr. Willett's Mission Tour

riding the wave just ahead of its crest until he is driven far up on the shore. The skill with which the practised surf rider accomplishes this feat is astonishing.

The canoes are provided with an outrigger, a bar held at a distance of a few feet to keep the craft from capsizing. Then a company of six or eight paddlers take the canoe out to meet the wave, and come riding in on its foaming top in a most exciting style. People who live along a coast like that should be the finest swimmers in the world. And such the Hawaiians believe themselves to be, proving it by the fact that one of their young men carried off the world's record for long distance swimming at the last Olympic games in Stockholm.

But our steamer was to sail at 5:00, and we had to hurry away all too soon from the Waikiki Beach. By the time we reached the pier the signals were sounding for departure, and with passengers wearing a profusion of lovely wreaths, the token of a Hawaiian Aloha, "welcome," and farewell, we drifted out of the harbor, while the small boys of the town performed astonishing diving feats in quest of coins thrown from the decks. Soon the city, then the rocky punch bowl above it, then the Diamond Head, and lastly even the Pali cliff faded from view. But far into the evening we watched the receding coast line, and where the fires of some consuming guava plantation loomed against the sky, as the old and useless trees were burned in huge piles, we tried to imagine that Pele was once more lighting her beacons to pierce the gloom of the gathering night.

THE BARONESS VON SUTTNER

Baroness Bertha von Suttner has been a center of attraction at the National Suffrage Convention in Philadelphia, where she spoke on the last evening.

Baroness Von Suttner is probably the leading apostle of International Peace in the world today. A daughter of the Imperial Field Marshall, Franz Joseph, Count von Kinsky, and granddaughter of the Princess Christine Lichtenstein, she has royal as well as noble blood in her veins, and she certainly did not inherit her hatred of war. She married Baron von Suttner contrary to the wishes of their parents. The lovers quietly disappeared for ten years in the Caucasus. It was a happy time, well described by the Baroness in her Memoirs and by the Baron in his book, "The Children of the Caucasus." Poverty and literary struggles during these ten years developed thoughtfulness and power in the former society girl. Born in the highest rank, she now learned to know poverty and self-support as a poor man's wife, and became a sympathizer with the down-trodden and war-racked races.

Husband and Herself Voluminous Writers.

After returning from the Caucasus, she and her husband lived for nearly twenty years in the old family castle at Harmannsdorf, near Vienna. Both were voluminous writers, and their works were well received by the public. After the Baron's death in 1902 his wife went to Vienna and devoted herself to the cause of peace.

The great development of the peace movement in Europe is due largely to her zealous work. In several of her early books, such as "The Machine Age," and "The Inventory of the Soul," she had already attacked the question of war in a style so vigorous that the anonymous author was taken to be a man. Among her other books along reform lines may be mentioned "Before the Tempest," "Checks to Torrents," and "The Human Uplift." The last named, which has just appeared, deals with the substitution of international arbitration for war.

Her Great Novel.

In none of her books, however have her anti-war arguments been presented so powerfully as in her best-known work, "Die Waffen Nieder" (Lay Down Your Arms), her masterpiece, for which she was awarded the $40,000 Nobel prize. This novel has gone into the hundreds of thousands, and has been translated into every civilized language. It has been prepared as a school text book; it has been dramatized many times, and its title is today a household word in German Europe. No book in the peace list has treated the question so popularly and at the same time so profoundly. The novel overflows with the spirit of love—conjugal love, love of children, love of nature, love of animals and humanity. Its points were gathered from every possible source—historical, philosophical and statistical, and all are brought out through the medium of a rarely interesting story. It has been counted among the ten great novels of the world.

It has been styled the Uncle Tom's Cabin of the peace movement. It may well be called so, in view of the slavery of militarism into which every male child is born who opens his eyes in the realms of the socalled "Great Powers." The schools are made preparatory to military service, and if any boy fails to pass his examination he is punished by a special and degrading kind of service in the army. This causes many boys in their teens to commit suicide every year.

Prince Dolgorouky says that the reading of this book, along with Bloch's great book on "War," led the Czar to issue his famous peace manifesto in 1898. At any rate, close upon its appearance came the first International Peace Congress and the Hague Conference. Immediately peace societies sprang up in France, Italy, and all over northern and central Europe, Germany alone having nearly a hundred. The book, in connection with the author's personal activity, led to the opening of centers for peace work in Austria, Hungary, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, and Scandinavia. The Baroness was thereafter dubbed "The woman who moved the Czar," but she moved all Europe, and the world as well.

A Romantic Incident.

The Baroness and Alfred Nobel were first brought together through a romantic incident. Nobel, a wealthy dynamite manufacturer, had advertised for a housekeeper, who was to be a lady of rank. Just at this time the Suttner family were opposing their son's marriage to the young Countess von Kinsky because she had no dowry. This put into her head the idea of disappearing. So off to Paris bravely and broken-heartedly went the young Countess, who, though higher in rank, was poorer in purse than her lover. It was Alfred Nobel who received her, listened with sympathy to her story and became her warm friend and champion ever after. We owe it to her that the inventor and manufacturer of dynamite and war explosives backed up the peace movement with his millions, and left a fortune to be distributed yearly to the women and men who do the most to further the cause. The fact that he remained for life a bachelor and her devoted friend may some day be made the foundation of an international romance.

Organizes Many Peace Societies.

The Baroness personally cooperated in organizing the peace societies of Budapest, Vienna, Berlin, Venice, Trieste and many other cities. She is especially proud of having helped to organize the German-American Peace Society of New York City.

She is kept busy contributing stories, reports, editorials and interviews in German, Italian and French to papers published in those languages, carrying on a voluminous correspondence with the leaders of the peace movement in both hemispheres, attending peace congresses and preparing programs, etc., etc.

Aids Other Reforms.

Aside from the peace movement, the Baroness has been a zealous worker for the prevention of cruelty to animals, against anti-Semitic prejudice and in favor of equal rights for women. What she has done in behalf of women's higher education would in itself be a life work for an ordinary woman. Her researches into international law and her studies in parliamentary and constitutional history would qualify her for a high university degree; but it is a greater glory to have kept the choice spirits of Europe ablaze with enthusiasm for the peace cause for almost half a century.

Baroness von Suttner was brought to America on her present visit by the Chicago Women's Club. She addressed the National Education Association in Chicago, the Biennial of the General Federation of Women's Clubs in San Francisco, and has been heard during the summer before many civic, commercial and women's clubs. She has a nimble wit, an optimistic logic, much vigor of speech, and a rich and far reaching imagination, all permeated with the glow of a warm and loving heart.

Secretary Suttner League.

The Baroness is accompanied to America by Mrs. Andrea Hofer Proudfoot of Chicago and Vienna, International secretary of the Suttner League. The League is made up of active peace workers who wish to carry on and perpetuate the life work of this famous peace apostle. It does propaganda work in central Europe through press work and speeches in German. It includes several recipients of the Nobel prize and members of the Hague tribunal, men and women of the highest attainments. It is meant to be a living and working monument to her ideal, rather than to her in person, and has been formed during her life time so that the artist fingers which have done so much to shape the peace movement may guide its plans. Mrs. Proudfoot, the descendant of a military Austrian family, is well qualified for peace work.

A Good Memory

The women of the society clustered in an excited little knot about their stately, white-haired president. "It was prefectly inexcusable," sputtered a peppery little woman. "Of course you will leave her off the reception committee," said another decidely. "I think," chimed in the youngest member, "that the secretary should write her a letter and request her to apologize to the president or resign from the society.

The others nodded in quick approval, but the president shook her head. "I will admit," she said in an even, well-modulated voice, "that Mrs. A— was both hasty and perhaps a little irritating in her criticisms, but we must not forget her previous good work in our society. When I was ill last winter she took entire charge of the first lecture, and I am sure you can all remember instances where she has shown her interest and loyalty. Wouldn't it be unwise to censure her for one little slip and ignore all her past services?"

The others looked thoughtful and let the matter drop. But at the next meeting of the society they felt justified in their president when the culprit arose and admitted her error frankly.

"It's a lesson to me," announced the youngest member, "and the next time I get "riled" and disgusted with somebody, I'm going to think of all the other times she's been nice."

"The seventy times seven is a good rule for forgiving yet," whispered the president lovingly.—The Congregationalist.

A token for good in Danville, Ill., is the invitation extended by Second Church to J. A. Barnett, new pastor of Third Church, to conduct its evangelistic meeting this fall. The meeting is now in progress and is drawing the congregations of that city together more closely than in recent years.

Royal L. Handley made 1,000 pastoral calls in his Kalamazoo, Mich., parish the past year. There were eighty-six additions to the church, forty-five by confession of faith. The congregation is now making vigorous effort to make a large payment on its building debt.

First Church, Tacoma, Wash., W. A. Moore, pastor, has a Sunday evening contest in progress between married and single people, the single people sitting in the gallery and the married on the main floor. This amount is additional to the $30,000 paid to the institution by Mr. Phillips' bequest. The gift is made unconditionally, but with the expectation that there will be a moral response by Disciples in the Southwest resulting in at least $150,000 more being secured.

Dedication in Cleveland Suburb.

Walter S. Goode, pastor at Lakewood, O., is enthusiastic about the dedication success which his congregation enjoyed on Nov. 3. The new building cost $21,000. On Sunday $11,000 remained to be raised and the people gave $13,000. F. M. Rains was master of the day's doings. Lakewood is a suburb of Cleveland.

Down Town Service in Indianapolis.

Harry G. Hill, recently pastor of Third church, Indianapolis, has opened a service in the down town part of the city, preaching on Sunday evenings in the Odd Fellows' Temple. The folder used at these services betokens a good spirit of true Christian helpfulness. Such a work could be made fruitful in good results, and all his brethren will pray for Mr. Hill that his work may be so blessed. The organization is called "The Peoples' Union."

Church and Pastor Make Gains.

On November 3, J. E. Pickett began the second year of his ministry at Modesto, Calif. The year that has closed was a year of gain to church and preacher. Forty-six new names were added to the membership of the congregation, all at regular services. A handsome property was purchased at a cost of about $4,000 in which the preacher may live undisturbed by the rent collector or sale agent. All current expenses have been met and the sum of $659.27 paid for missions and benevolences. A revival meeting will begin next week with Dr. T. A. Boyer, of Oakland, as evangelist, and H. F. Edson, soloist and director.

Dr. Philputt at Ann Arbor.

The University of Michigan and the "campus churches" at Ann Arbor hold a great union service every Sunday evening at which some minister from a distance is invited to preach. The effort is to get a greater number of people, especially students and faculty, to attend evening service. On Nov. 17 Dr. Allan B. Philputt, pastor of Central Church, Indianapolis preached the sermon to a large congregation in the Presbyterian Church.

A Year's Activity in Cleveland Church.

The annual report of the West Boulevard Christian Church, Cleveland, Ohio, F. C. Ford, minister, showed a net total of $8,282.77 raised in all departments of the church. Four thousand dollars was raised from pledges made on dedication day, when the new house was set apart for the work of God. About $450 was for missions and benevolences. There were forty-six additions during the year, twenty-nine by baptism and seventeen by letter and statement; nine letters were granted. Present membership, 227; Bible-school active enrollment, 356; a net growth of 111. The minister's report showed 951 pastoral calls, six funerals, twelve weddings and 106 sermons and addresses.

A False and Disappearing Antithesis.

It's not heartening to those who are striving to teach us that the religion of Jesus belongs essentially in the social life of the world to read in a Christian paper such sentiments as these: "The election is over—now for business in the realm of our King." "Politics has had its day—let's turn our full attention to religion." "A government that bows more humbly at the altar of politics than at the foot of the cross will soon see the handwriting on the wall." Happily such an unideal conception of politics and such a crude conception of religion as would bring the two realms into the antithesis involved in these quotations have seen the hand writing on the wall. But they are not yet extinct.

Improvements at Central Indianapolis.

Central Church, Indianapolis, Allan B. Philputt, minister, is rebuilding its house of worship. The auditorium has been cleaned and refurnished in Tiffany tone at an expense of $16,000. The Sunday-school department is being enlarged by an addition 18 ft. by 65 ft. and the whole made two full stories, with basement for kitchen, dining-room and athletic rooms. The departments of the Sunday-school will have separate rooms, the capacity of the building being about doubled. Many minor improvements will be made giving the church one of the best plants for work in the state. It will easily accommodate a Sunday-school of eight hundrede. The cost of the whole is about $15,000, most of which was pledged at a recent Sunday morning service.

"The First Five Minutes After Death."

Burris A. Jenkins preached in his Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, on a recent Sunday evening on the subject, "The First Five Minutes After Death." "We experience an infinite sense of relief within the first five minutes after death," he said. "It is an amalgamation of suprises. It is a gathering of all the flowers of the world. It is the honey of infinite swarms of bees. It is the whirring of insect wings too delicate for human comprehension. It is one glad surprise." These were some of the phrases used by Dr. Jenkins. "Then comes work. Every man will be set at his own congenial employment, on the astral plane. It is high time for us to get our wits about us and think about death as we think about the things for which we live. It is the terror of life that faces us and not the terror of death."

An Active and Fruit-bearing Church.

Here is surely an active and fruit-bearing church: Mansfield, Ohio, Charles R. Oakley, pastor. Mr. Oakley began his fifth year Nov. 3. A summary of the achievements of the four years is worthy of note. Sermons 569, funerals 86, weddings 98, baptisms 202, total added 329, lost by death and removal 148, net increase 181, pastoral calls, 2,309. Finance: Missions, $5,617.46; debts and interest, $8,383.10; all other expense $18,-999.44; grand total $33,000.44. A weekly paper has been established and maintained, a secretary employed, all indebtedness lifted, missions increased from one to three living links, from $900 in 1908 to $1,643.01 in 1912, budget system successfully installed. A pipe organ has been installed and a number of new organiations launched. The church is united and happy in its growing usefulness and power.

A Drastic But Reasonable Measure.

State Secretary J. Fred Jones in his determination to eliminate from the ministry of Ilinois those men who are unworthy and who use the sacred profession as a means of preying upon churches and individual church people, has adopted the plan of enrolling the ministers of the state on the endorsement of the congregation with which each minister holds his membership. This is one of the most effective methods yet hit upon to cure the evil of which the churches have long complained. There are preachers not a few who have no church membership. They are "free lances" and do not recognize the authority of the local church. They will not be answerable for their actions to any organization. Such a man should never be employed as pastor or evangelist. The churches have it in their power, as Mr. Jones points out to compel such men to secure church membership or go out of the preaching business. And the churches ought to stand behind their state secretary in his effort to secure such a certified enrollment of the ministry, and then see to it that the enrollment is referred to before a resident Illinois applicant for any pulpit is given a call.

Central Church, New York City.

Central Church, New York City, held its annual meeting Nov. 13 with a large attendance and an ideal spirit. Dr. James M. Philputt is just closing his first year with this congregation. Over $10,000 was given by this people for current expenses, and over $2,000 for missions and benevolence during the year. One member of the church supports his own foreign missionary. Additions to the membership were 144 making a total enrollment of 418. The Ladies' Aid Society and the Auxiliary of the C. W. B. M. have large memberships and are in a flourishing condition. The church is thoroughly united, happy and hopeful for the future. The Men's Association holds combination meetings with the men of two neighboring churches every other month. These meetings are addressed by prominent laymen. A flourishing Chinese Sunday-school class and a class of Russians and Poles studying English are maintained. The Sunday-school which has grown from seventy-eight a year ago to 127 works against the handicap of the general scarcity of children in New York's Protestant families. It is said that in Central Church's families there are less than forty children!

Getting Hold of the Boys.

I. J. Spencer has introduced the Kappa Sigma Pi or Modern Knights of St. Paul into his church, Central, of Lexington, Ky. This is an organization for boys founded upon Scripture teachings and especially on the life of St. Paul. In order to supply the needs of the three psychological periods of a boy's life there are three degrees. As early as the age of ten years the boy may take the first degree called "The Order of Jerusalem." The boy pledges himself to attend some Sunday-school, to abstain from bad company and harmful habits and to live a right sort of life. The heroic presentation of the life of Paul often becomes the incentive of the boys that results in multiplying the number of boys in Sunday-school four fold. At the age of thirteen he may take the second degree, "The Order of Damascus." This degree is based upon Paul's experience at Damascus and the boy now pldeges himself to confess Christ to the world on all reasonable occasions and ways. Boys are not forced into this decision but come to it themselves naturally as a result of the work that has been done in the club. At the age of sixteen he may take the third degree, "The Order of Rome." Paul's journey to Rome was as a final offering of himself to the church; so in this degree the boys are members of the church, and active workers in the same. Boys may remain members

Harmoy, Zeal and Growth at Wichita.

The annual reports of Walter Scott Priest's great Central Church at Wichita, Kan., are always an inspiration to our entire communion. Just now they are celebrating Mr. Priest's third anniversary as pastor. When Mr. Priest began his ministry there there were two congregations of "our faith and order," with two houses of worship and two ministers. Now there are four congregations, with four ministers and four houses of worship. Central has swarmed twice, sending about seventy-five members each to the Fairview Avenue and West Douglas Avenue churches—the Fairview Avenue church being the outgrowth of a mission started during the ministry of Mr. Priest's predecessor, E. W. Allen. Central Church has just completed the raising of $10,000—$2,500 to be given each of the new churches to help them build and $5,000 to be spent in providing a Sunday-school addition to Central's building, which will give them a room with 250 seats for their great men's class, a Primary department for accommodating 150 little folks and a suite of two rooms for the pastor's office, and also a secretary's room. Fairview Avenue church is just completing a $15,000 structure and West Douglas Avenue church a $6,000 building, both to be occupied in about six weeks. In the past three years Mr. Priest has received 588 persons into the fellowship of the church, of whom 221 have been baptized; married 171 couples, an average of fifty-seven a year; conducted 112 funeral services and delivered many special addresses. All missionary offerings have been largely increased, the church sustaining three Living Links on the foreign field, one on the home field and contributing about $18,000 in pledges to Phillips Christian University. The church was honored at the Louisville Convention in that Judge J. N. Haymaker was elected president of the national Brotherhood, and Mr. Gill a director. There is said to be perfect harmony and great enthusiasm in this efficient body of Disciples. A protracted meeting, with Albert E. Buss leading the singing, will begin January 2.

Sad News from Africa

The following cablegram was received from the Congo, Africa, at the office of the Foreign Society Nov. 21:

"Mrs. R. R. Eldred passed away very peacefully Nov. 13.—A. F. Hensey."

Mr. and Mrs. Eldred were stationed at Longa in the Congo, Africa. No sadder news has ever been received from the mission fields in all our history. Mrs. Eldred went out to Africa first in 1902. After spending a vacation season here she returned with her husband to the field leaving South Bend, Ind., Nov. 26, 1910, and reached Longa March 17, 1911. They left their three little boys in the home for missionaries' children, Hiram, in care of Mrs. M. D. Adams. The little fellows have had every care that a good woman can bestow upon them, but they have not had a mother. Mrs. Eldred gave up all for Africa's teeming millions. She could not do more. She has done all she could. Her devotion has been without bounds. Our hearts go out to the children, to the aged mother, and to all the relatives and friends. Of course, we remember and pray for the bereft husband. He has shown true apostolic spirit. No truer man has entered any field. May the God of all peace comfort his broken heart and bless him and his children. Three precious lives have been given for the Congo Mission. Such sacrifices should quicken all the friends to a deeper devotion for the evangelization of the dark continent. A. McLean, President.

Home Mission Notes

Government Hill, San Antonio, Texas, organized a new church with forty members. Albert T. Fitts is the stirring genius who has brought the organization to pass.

Our Russian brethren, Professor Schmidt and Dr. Patmont, with Field Agent Homer E. Sala, continue their intinerary among the churches. Words of highest praise and expression of Christian enthusiasm come from every church fortunate enough to open their doors to them. Last week they were at Cynthiana and Maysville, Ky.; and Dayton, Canton, Akron, Uhrichville and New Philadelphia, Ohio. This week they are at Euclid Avenue and Franklin Circle, Cleveland, Hiram College, Detroit, Michigan, Toledo, Mansfield and Steubenville, Ohio. They are yet to visit Allegheny City, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and New York. A great reception is being planned for them in New York and a bon voyage on their return to Russia. I. N. McCash, Sec'y.

A Summer Home in Winter

Owing to the expected crowded condition of Eustis during the coming winter season there is a greater demand for good accommodations than can be secured. At the earnest solicitation of friends Mrs. W. T. Moore has consented to offer six large rooms at The Palms for the accommodation of Christian people. A northern lady, who is an expert caterer, has been secured to take full charge of the comfort of the guests, and enjoyable home living is assured. Christ's Universal Language

DO NOT permit these proud days to deceive you. The time is not far away when you will feel that it is not in the power of rhetoric or passion to add anything to the words of Jesus Christ. The metaphysician may secretly regret that the Nazarene did not discourse like a Plato or a Locke; the poet may wish that the Son of Man had said more about the land, sea, and sky, about opening springtime or the falling leaf; the Calvinist and Trinitarian may wish they could find in the Lord's discourse a system that should more fully shadow forth their own; and devotees of science may feel at times that the "Cosmos" of Humboldt surpasses the simple story of the Gospels. But these longings and complaints are only the result of narrow specializations. Christ spoke for a whole world, for the times of its greatest need; and the wish of the specialist is engulfed in the wide, infinite wish of mankind. Our wishes are the style of time; Christ's manner the style of eternity.

HOLIDAY BOOKS WORTH WHILE

The Green Devil

A Romance of Thornton Abbey

By ARTHUR METCALF

You plunge into action and the atmosphere of mystery in the very first pages of The Green Devil, and the interest holds with quickly changing scenery and a procession of events till the close. It is historical fiction, and the story centers about Thornton Abbey in the days of Wyclif. The story tells of the time when monkish tenets were being disputed, and the common people were banding together in preparation for the insurrection commonly known as Wat Tyler's. At such times, when foundation stones of Church and State are loosened, new and terrible powers of evil seem to flourish. Such was the mysterious marauder called, from his costume, The Green Devil. There is plenty of excitement connected with his career, bound up as it was with a stolen and restolen will, secret dungeons, and a clever witch who appeals to the sympathies amazingly. It is well worthy to be read and then put by to be read again. 512 pages.

The Even Hand

By "QUINCY GERMAINE"

A dramatic story of retributive justice. Harshness and wrong are met by anger and violence. They who sow the Wind reap the Whirlwind. It deals with the relations of Capital and Labor. The characters are drawn with accuracy and a vividness born of personal familiarity. Two men stand out as the chief characters, John Nelson, the grandson of the founder of the Commonwealth Mills, a friend of labor, just and reasonable, Nicholas Marchbanks, a grasping Mill Agent, and a man of power. The plot is concerned with the settlement of a complicated and menacing strike. Not only the vital interest of the subject treated, but the vivid manner in which the story is told, grips the reader with a continuous and compelling interest. 276 pages.

At the Crossing with Dennis McShane

By WILLIAM ALLEN KNIGHT

This latest and best story from Mr. Knight is rich with Christmas spirit which breaks down social and religious barriers and is "no respecter of persons." Its central figure is a witty, warm-hearted Irishman, a crossing sweeper, to whom, in babyhood days, a gypsy fortune teller gave a magic ring, together with a mystic, prophetic rhyme. The story tells of the friendship between this Catholic street sweeper and a broad-minded Protestant Domine, how they went together to hear a certain "Gypsy missioner," and how at last the secret of the ring was revealed. Wit and pathos are admirably mingled in the story, the style is attractive, and interest is maintained from the first sentence to the end. Following are the chapters: I Before a Certain June Day. II Some Morningdale Matters Afterward. III Denis and the Gypsy. IV When Christmas Came. With five full-page illustrations by Mrs. Florence Scovel Shinn.

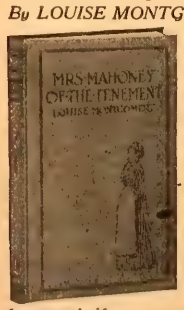
Mrs. Mahoney of the Tenement

By LOUISE MONTGOMERY



"Story! faith an' it's no story at all I'm tellin' ye," says Mrs. Mahoney in response to her comrade's criticism of the way her story comes out. "'Tis a bit iv life." After all it is not simply how the other half lives which Louise Montgomery tells in Mrs. Mahoney of the Tenement. Real human documents are these sketches of which the good-natured Irish woman is the connecting link. She is philosopher in ordinary of a kind of life that needs just such an interpreter to make the more fortunate half more sympathetic and helpful.

On the Way to Bethlehem

By WILLIAM ALLEN KNIGHT

A beautifully illustrated book of sympathetic journeys through Palestine by the author of The Song of Our Syrian Guest. He takes his friends with him on a journey through Palestine—and he is a rare dragoman! He entered from the north, traveling by rail from Damascus to the Sea of Galilee and then in more truly Oriental fashion southward to Jerusalem and Bethlehem, stopping here and there on the way. Dean Bosworth in The Congregationalist says of this book: "Its charm, as those will understand who have read the author's other books, is the opportunity which it gives him to share with his readers the thoughts that filled his mind in the midst of those suggestive scenes. Travelers see what they are fit to see, and fitness is a matter of heart and feeling as well as of mind. Dr. Knight traveled with the friendly, appreciative spirit that sometimes gained for him glimpses into the inner life of the people. He had also the artistic temperament necessary to describe what he saw. The book is the product of a poet's imagination restrained by an admixture of historic imagination. The book will give to its readers something of the author's deep sense of the historical and spiritual reality of Jesus Christ. It should be read a chapter at a time instead of continuously. Each chapter is a sort of gem, and gems are often best appreciated when looked at singly."

There are sixteen full-page illustrations, beautiful and well fitted to the text.

Through the School

By "AL PRIDDY," author of "Through the Mill"

"How did he come out?" was the question of more than one reader of Al Priddy's Through the Mill. This realistic autobiography stops just as the twenty-year-old boy turns his back on the cotton mill and starts in search of an education. How he arrived in a mid-Western college town with three dollars in his pockets, and after two years at an exceedingly orthodox but not very intellectual "university" (?) entered a theological seminary in the East and, finally reversing the order of things, graduated with a cum laude from one of the best New England colleges—all this and much more he tells in Through the School. It is a book to encourage the boy who wants a college education and has no resources but his empty hands, a persistent purpose, and unfailing courage. 404 pages.

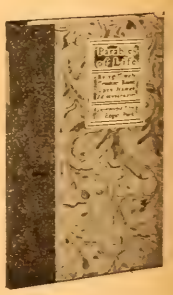
Parables of Life

Being Timely Treatises Based Upon Human Idiosyncrasies

By J. EDGAR PARK



These are not elaborate essays, but brief, humorous, and diverting morsels of advice; handy parcels of wisdom; odd and suggestive bits of description; all sensible, practical, and at the same time tickling the sense of humor. It is the best of counsel given with a smile and yet with seriousness.

Johnny Blossom

By EMILIE POULSSON

An ideal birthday or Christmas gift for a boy is this delightful story of ten-year-old Johnny Blossom, a fine, manly little fellow, warm-hearted and true as steel. Of course, being a boy full of life and spirit, he often rushes headlong into trouble, and many of his experiences—some ludicrous, some sad—are related in these pages. But he learns his lesson bravely, and when, though a lad, he becomes heir of the wealth and acres of Kingthorp, every one is glad, for he is universally beloved, by none better than by the humble folk. The book is illustrated attractively by Mrs. Florence Lilley Young, whose work in the Youth's Companion and other well-known papers has given her high rank in the field of child illustrators.

Ultima Veritas

By WASHINGTON GLADDEN

Dr. Washington Gladden's friends, and they are a multitude, will welcome the first collection ever issued of his poems, "Ultima Veritas." The title of the first poem gives the name of the collection. Of course the volume contains the famous Williams College song, "Oh proudly rise the monarchs of our mountain land," and the well-known hymn, "Oh Master, let me walk with thee." The collection also contains many other poems equally worthy of preservation, on themes grave and humorous, religious and patriotic.

Paying Our Debt to the Veterans

WE ARE ACCUSTOMED TO CLASSIFY Ministerial Relief with works of charity; we should learn to speak of it as a work of honesty.

We are accustomed to think of it as care for the aged; we ought to think of it as one of the best ways of recruiting the ministry.

We are accustomed to think of it as an offering for the needs of the worn-out veteran; we must think of it as a guarantee that the church shall continue to make history.

We are accustomed to think of it as an expression of our generosity; we must learn to think of it as the payment of a debt for unrequited toil.

Congregations have gone through the period of discussions, aye, and many of them are there even now, wherein it was asserted that were the minister possessed of any financial sense Ministerial Relief would be a superfluity. As has often been pointed out the minister did possess a large measure of financial sense, else he could not have survived in the struggle for existence; and with it he had what many men in his congregations had not, namely, such a devotion to his work that he was held true to the obligations of his holy calling in the midst of temptations to turn aside to other activities, until the watchers folded his worn out hands in dreamless sleep.

While the Church has been discussing the wisdom of Ministerial Relief, and viewing the veteran as a dependent upon its bounty, the soulless corporations have set aside millions as pensions for their employees, on the ground of unrequited toil.

It would seem that the Church might learn at least the lesson of humanity as easily as the railway corporations and telephone companies, and refute the charge that there is more genuine religion outside the Church than in it; that a railway has more thought for those who helped it to fortune than the Church has for those who ministered to it. But while churches have been timid in responding to this duty, excusing themselves by raising the question why the minister did not save, business organizations never wasted time in such procedures; but faced a fact, namely, that those who had given their strength to an enterprise, even though they were paid for their labor, should not be turned over to the tender mercies which wait upon a helpless and neglected old age.

All the arguments urged against the extravagance of the minister or the atrophy of his financial faculties, could be as justly urged against the man who throws a switch day after day or climbs a telephone pole. The difference between the Church and the business concern is that the Church prided itself upon its acute business sense and found fault with its servants in their old age; the business concern made no vaunt of its powers, and provided pensions for its servants in their old age.

Of course, the Church has done something, but think of the labor needed even today to constrain its membership to be as humane to its veterans as the government of the United States is to the retired officers in its army and navy.

After all our efforts the treasury of Ministerial Relief is shouting its poverty at us day after day.

And we must all face another fact, humiliating though it be, namely, that the neglect of its veterans by the Church is the principal reason why the Church complains that the students for the ministry are growing fewer year by year.

Self-sacrifice for Christ does not mean that a few shall bear the burdens of poverty while others of their brethren stand off and console the sufferer with the suggestion, "If you had been as thrifty as we you would not be where you are now."

The Church has yet to prove that it has a sense of justice. It has made a record for rare worldly judgment; we will even admit that it has proved that the preacher who comes to old age in poverty is a financial failure; but we insist that it has yet its record to make in doing its duty to those who have done more than their duty to the Church.

Isn't it strange that the Church whose praise is in all the earth because of her deeds of charity and mercy has never yet learned to take care of the dependent of her own household? Her oft-repeated assertion that charity begins at home, finds no corroboration in the records of Ministerial Relief.

Fortunately for us all the number of those who ask the Church to give them a fireside in old age is comparatively few, but whatever the number the Christian has no justification to ignore their call, seeing that they did their part well as soldiers of the common good. No matter what they might have been, they are today making a silent appeal which conscience must heed. We owe a debt which we must pay, and no just man will try to escape.

When our veterans go down in the fight let it be in full view of our own victories; let it be within sound of our cheering; let it be with their own heads resting on the arms of brotherly regard.

When they fall let them not die in solitude, under leaden skies, or wind-swept fields, or where they may feel the sting of ingratitude. Let the veteran know that his brethren surround him like a great cloud of witnesses, that above them in radiant rows are the chariots and horsemen which only eyes touched by the light that falls from other worlds are given to see; and let their last hour be cheered by their knowledge that we loved them for what they were, for what they are, and that not an hour since they retired from the places of danger or valor in the ranks, has our gratitude for them burned less brightly than the stars of honor blazing upon their breasts.

The veteran preacher is a hero; let us treat him as a hero, as a saint worthy of our benison on earth, who will soon be enjoying the blessedness of heaven.

Social Survey

The Church and Social Education

The modern church is now called upon to answer the challenge of the twentieth century. What is the church doing for the advancement of humanity?

To this demand of the new era, the church is responding slowly but surely, and there are numerous indications that the great Christian bodies of America are preparing to handle with increasing potency those questions which most vex human society.

The remarkable work done by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, in instituting a nation-wide campaign to stimulate intelligent interest in social problems, marks an epoch in church history. Old methods of attacking social problems are now seen to be inadequate; and there is an increasing demand in religious circles for greater familiarity with the new body of scientific social knowledge.

Much time must elapse before this new knowledge can pass through the minds of a vast number of people and bring a resultant change in their habits of thought and conduct; for the reforms that occur in a day are of little consequence, and the most important acquisitions of the race are very slowly acquired.

The church follows the character and progress of its constituents, just as the state follows the character and progress of the citizen. Church work is an expression of the mind of the workers, and its efficiency or inefficiency is a reflection of their education or their lack of it.

Hence great emphasis must be placed on the educational process as a means of solving the problems of both church and state. Even greater emphasis must be placed on the nature of the educational process. For, from the standpoint of race progress, systems of education, either religious or secular, are wholly inadequate when they train men and women to play special parts in religious or social machinery, but fail to make them respond to the great economic and political needs of city, state and nation.

Hence great emphasis must be placed on the importance of social education in both church and state, in order that religion may with greater efficiency hasten the coming of the kingdom of God on earth; and education achieve its fundamental object, the training of men and women to be citizens of a free commonwealth.

To further this end, and in response to numerous requests from clergymen, the following bibliography has been compiled for publication.

Sex Instruction by Parents

BY E. M. STEPHENSON.

Teach children that sex is not evil but, when properly understood and guarded, is as sacred as any other impulse of life.

Teach children that certain subjects are not for conversation; that modesty and good manners forbid the mention of such matters out of their proper time and place.

Teach children to cultivate an attitude of obliviousness toward certain things; for example, the habits of infants and animals in attending to the exigencies of nature.

Teach children to trust their parents to keep them informed on all matters essential to their welfare, and to avoid all voluntary information from persons not specially authorized, especially if too young to know more than themselves.

Teach the children that life in all forms is sacred.

See to it that all children are given instruction in certain matters at the right time, and remember that the right time is that, when, in the course of nature, they are compelled to think about them because of their own physical growth, and when, as a consequence, their mental life compels speech.

The natural rule would seem to be: as soon as reverent knowledge can be reverently acquired it should be reverently given.

General bracing in morals and in intelligence and in character is not enough; it will fall short. There is need of something direct and special in this matter. The life of the race is wrapped up in it.

Since the influences of home life are the most lasting influences, why not exert them in this, one of the most vital matters of life?

Precocious teaching by progressive parents of good intentions, but short on pertinent knowledge, is a bane. In our teaching we must not make for pruriency. We must not awaken love before its time.

We should consider the fact that children come to themselves gradually, and pass slowly from one stage of development to another. Teaching that is too abrupt is also a bane. We must not force children's minds in these matters, and thus give them a soiled attitude toward them. They are too sacred to be trifled with.

Every woman except one at the ladies' aid society had been complaining that the dry season would ruin the crops, and when they asked her if the drought had not hurt her fruit garden she said: "Yes, but I'll tell you what cured me of worrying. I used to fret over everything, and one spring when I sat down to have a good cry because an untimely frost during peach-blossoming threatened to ruin our splendid prospects for fruit, my Aunt Martha came in, and reminded me that she had lived eighty years, and the world's stock of provisions had never failed yet. 'If we don't have peaches, we'll have pumpkins,' said she. And I've noticed since then that in spite of all the frosts and droughts I've never suffered for food, and I don't believe you have, either." They all smiled rather sheepishly, and the president said, thoughtfully: "That's true. 'Peaches or pumpkins.' I'll try to remember that."—Sunday-school Times.

The Care of the Saints

From the report of the Board of Ministerial Relief we read: "The two primary human factors in the church's advancement are the minister and the meeting-house. Our own churches have emphasized this fact by investing, up to date, something like $30,000,000 in church property and paying annual salaries to the amount of some $3,000,000. But in striking contrast we have always cherished our property, with repairs, improvements and insurance, while we are just beginning to think about conserving our ministry. This, again, is natural, because the ministry has led our thinking, and they have not thought of themselves."

We are learning that all workers are entitled to pensions in old age if they have not been able to lay aside enough to keep them in comfort. It used to be the soldier to whom the great rewards were given. He protected the state and the state took care of him. Now we know that every worker in every useful occupation is a benefactor. The amount of money a man has when he reaches old age is no indication of the amount of service he has rendered, for men who give attention to the accumulation of money may be giving very little in return for what they get while many who are doing the best work may miss great financial rewards. Thrift is a virtue, but thrift in material things may be at the expense of thrift in spiritual things. Some choose to put spiritual values above the material. If by reason of this choice they arrive at the age of retirement without the means to secure exemption from want, those who have profited by their labors should provide for them liberally.

We are told that we have six hundred fewer preachers than we had five years ago. Many useful men have quit the ministry. Financial difficulties do not account for all this loss. Sectarian rivalry has made it impossible for the preacher to do a satisfactory work in many places and self-respecting men are becoming less and less willing to follow the business of keeping alive churches that have no vision. But the most devoted minister must have food and clothing and when he sees that he cannot lay aside part of his salary for the uses of old age he is forced to consider his duty to himself and to his family. The assurance of a sufficient pension when the day for retirement comes will save many good men to the ministry. The Christian man of the present has respect for his body. He believes in the doctrine of health. It is a matter of conscience with him to quit an occupation that does not promise the ordinary comforts for his old age.

An objection to pensions for ministers is thus met in the report of the Board of Ministerial Relief: "Occasionally some one who has given the matter no thought, or viewed it from only one side, intimates that the minister ought to take his chance with other men; save up for his old age and for those dependent upon him and accept the consequences of failure. At best, they say, the institutions of our National Benevolent Association should be sufficient for ministers and their families, as well as for other members. But on a moment's reflection such an objector will see that it is precisely because we do not allow the minister, in his labor, to 'take his chances like other men' that we cannot dismiss him when his work is done. The farmer sells his grain, the laborer his time and the manufacturer his product where it will bring the most. A man must disregard this rule to enter the ministry, for it offers only a living, and that on the average but half as good as the same talent, education and energy would command elsewhere. Then, within the ministry, he must go or stay at the behest of duty and need, not of self-interest. The place-hunter and salary-grabber is not canonized, and churches are justly suspicious of speculating parsons."

We must pension the minister on the basis of service. Men that have never done anything for the church or the state ought not to be left to starve but they cannot hope for the recognition accorded to workers. If any one says that there are others besides soldiers and ministers for whom provision should be made we cannot decline to listen; on the contrary, as Disciples of Jesus we are bound to advocate the cause of all to whom justice is not being done. To provide for the preacher is not to neglect others: it is a step toward justice to all. The preacher is only one of the world's benefactors but it is not to be forgotten that he is one and that justice to him helps the others. [Midweek Service. Dec. 11. Rom. 12: 13: 15: 26: 1 Cor. 16: 1-2: 2 Cor. 9: Heb. 6: 10.]

Reforming Our Evangelism

It need not be said that The Christian Century is in sympathy with New Testament evangelism, and if proof were needed it could point to its protests against the perversions of that evangelism, and what was believed to be its methods. While others lavished indiscriminate applause upon the big revival, ignoring its defects, evidently on the ground that the end justifies the means, The Century continued its contention for a sane evangelism, and withstood the criticism of friends and foes alike. It knew that evangelism must be reformed, since it was rapidly being ruined, and to persist in those follies which the evangelists themselves now are saying must be brought to an end, could only mean the passing from the church of a potentially great service to the limbo of things obsolete. The recovery of evangelistic eye sight is one of the most hopeful symptoms in the solution of the problem.

In helping our evangelism towards a better condition it should be suggested that the churches can do much to remedy the wrongs if they will; and it can be said in all candor that about one-half of the blame for the abuses which evangelists are themselves today confessing rests with the churches. The evangelists have simply met the demands of the churches, and those demands have resulted in lowering the standards of church life in all the churches of the land. The congregations must demand a higher order of service from evangelists, and better types of evangelists. They must be willing to endure some of the sarcifices which are necessary to all reform. We are about rid of the cowboy and rowdy types of evangelists, particularly the latter—for there might have been some justification in western frontiers for the former—and also of the dictatorial type whose professionalism could only be justified on some such grounds as men used to give for the burning of heretics.

The long suffering of the churches with many evangelistic faults shows that evangelism is a necessity, else with evangelistic freaks the churches would have had no dealings; they tolerated the false in the hope of preserving the true. While the dictator is not extinct, his class is in the throes of dissolution. In a few years we shall have the pleasure of writing his epitaph.

The churches must give up the notion that the evangelist is a wonder-worker, that he can solve problems which the churches in all good conscience should solve themselves, that he can do in a few weeks what the church has been trying to do for years, and often vainly, and that he must shoulder burdens which the indifference or laziness of many congregations would impose upon him.

The evangelist should be adequately paid for his work. That would relieve the evangelist from the necessity of wringing the reluctant nickel from the greedy palm of the churches; it would do much to save the evangelists from the charge of "grafting." The parsimony of congregations has often times forced the evangelist to resort to unholy methods of securing funds in the hope of providing for those dependent upon him. Many harsh things are said of the evangelist and his love of gold, but the congregation's love is sometimes a little stronger than his. If churches had a little more conscience in this matter the evangelist would have better compensations, and better relations between both would exist.

Some other standard of success than that of numbers should be established. We know we are treading on dangerous ground here, for the self-evident reason that it is better to add five hundred persons to a church than fifty; but we do not wish to be misunderstood. The Church cannot have too many converts, and no one ever objected to numbers on the ground of conversion; they have objected to conversions which were merely numbers. It is the easiest thing in the world to fall into the habit of substituting a mere process of addition for the conversion of souls. All converts look alike when numbered, and all numbers look alike in the press reports; hence the deceptions of which even the best men are the victims. There is nothing in itself criticisable in a telegraph report of hundreds of additions but one cannot be blind to the fact that such advertising has one eye to future calls for meetings. And it is at this point where the lust of numbers does its deadly work. It is just here that the current criticisms find their fullest support. The "decoy" method of gaining "converts" is a well known practice. The telegrams report the fact that "three score of men took their stand for Christ," when the sequel shows they did no such thing. It is grievous to call attention to these things, but our language is no harsher than that employed by the evangelists themselves, and if it is grievous to call attention to such practices how much worse it is to practice them! When numbers are made such an important factor in a meeting that the community jeers at it; when numbers are displayed in public places; and when the revilalist appeals for "ten more to-night, so that we may begin tomorrow with fifty," the protest against numbers as a standard of success in conversion has sufficient justification.

If it be replied that three thousand conversions are reported in the Book of Acts, it should also be kept in mind that "a great company of priests became obedient to the faith," and that "many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed, and were baptized." The indefinite as well as the specific may be found; so when abuses follow a practice there is abundant reason, even from Scripture, why it should be given up.

How passionate the craze for numbers is may be gathered from the fact that some evangelists demand that no invitations be given to the unconverted six months before the revival begins, the object being to secure a large number of additions in the early part of the meeting. It is passing strange that the unconverted may live six months in blissful ignorance of their fate, only to have it thrust upon them with the appearance of the evangelist. At once they learn that hell is yawning for them, and they have a right to wonder why some one did not tell them that before. And the irony of the situation appears when an evangelist who preaches the danger of delay makes delay a condition of his coming to a congregation, to which if the congregation will not agree he will not come. Such are his terms; and such is the psychology of conversion—and numbers.

A Sound Editorial on Sound Speech

The Christian Evangelist strikes at a misuse of language which all right thinking and right feeling Disciples of Christ should strive to correct. It objects to calling the Louisville convention a convention of "The Christian Church," and suggests its decided preference for the name happily chosen at Louisville and increasingly used by the convention program makers in recent years, namely, the convention of "Disciples of Christ." Responding to an inquiry for the reason of this preference our neighbor says rightly:

One all-sufficient reason would be that we who are engaged in this reformation are not a church at all, much less "The Christian Church." Our movement is made up of a large number of persons, organized into local churches of Christ, but in the aggregate they do not constitute "The Church of Christ," nor "The Christian Church," in the scriptural use of these terms. The brethren of the "Christian Connection," as we sometimes call them, have adopted as their denominational name "The Christian Church," just as there is a "Presbyterian Church," "Lutheran Church," etc. Popularly speaking, it has become a custom among us to speak of ourselves as members of "The Christian Church," but no well-informed person, even though he use the phrase, would defend it as "sound speech which cannot be condemned." We are, however, Disciples of Christ in the aggregate, and if we spell it with a capital D it is only because of a necessity which is forced upon us by the laws of language, and by the divided condition of the church. It means there are other disciples of Christ not so designated. It is as modest a designation as we can assume, if we designate ourselves at all. There is no exclusiveness in it, and no assumption of a monopoly of it.

This is sound reasoning and good taste also. The elemental principles of Christian comity, to say nothing of the usage of Scripture, suggest that those local congregations of Disciples which pass under the title "First Christian Church" or "The Christian Church" should change their name so as to be free from the charge of using the catholic title of all followers of Christ and of all his churches in a sectarian and invidious sense.

A Congregational Tribute to Presbyterianism

A Presbyterian Synod for New England was organized recently in Boston, making the Presbyterian churches of that section independent of the New York Presbytery with which they had been affiliated. There are fifty Presbyterian churches in the six New England states. Commenting on the event the Congregationalist speaks as follows:

The event calls attention to the growth of Presbyterianism on New England soil during the last twenty-five years. It has rooted itself firmly in Boston, Brookline, Manchester, Bridgeport, Worcester, Springfield and in a number of other places where the Scotch-Irish element is found in considerable strength, or where there are those who have recently come from the Maritime Provinces of Canada. Its progress has been accompanied by a display of the enthusiasm and definiteness of purpose that usually go with the onward march of religious movements on relatively virgin soil. The largest church is at Stamford, Ct., with a membership of 612, and led by the Moderator of the new synod, Rev. Howard A. Johnston, D. D. Last week's notable forward step was properly made an occasion for denominational congratulation. Moderator Mark A. Mathews of the General Assembly came on from Seattle to extend recognition and to incite the brethren to greater zeal, while secretaries of the national boards were on hand to present their respective causes and to enhance the sense of denominational fellowship and denominational responsibility. All in all it was one of the most noteworthy religious events of the autumn, and, fittingly enough, representatives of other denominations, including Dr. Conrad, who spoke for the Congregationalists, and Dr. James A. Francis, who voiced the salutations of the Baptists, both former Presbyterians, extended the greetings of the churches that have been longer on the ground.

Possibly, too, these Presbyterians have something to teach the rest of us. Certainly the vitality and outreach of Presbyterianism throughout the country in the last decade compel respect. It has been fortunate in having within its ranks strong leaders, who have displayed remarkable initiative. Dr. Chapman in the evangelistic field, Charles Stelzle as a mediator between capital and labor, and Warren H. Wilson as a keen student of the country problem, have done a work for the whole Church of Christ, but at the same time have kept warm the ties that bound them to their particular denomination. Then, too, Presbyterianism has benefited through large bequests, like the Kennedy millions. Besides all this, its highly centralized government, its positive affirmation of Christian truth and its evangelistic zeal have been and are real assets.

College Union Begun in Montreal

While the Disciples have been agitated in some sections over the union of colleges in Nanking, China, and the consolidation on an undenominational basis of the Congregational and Disciple Seminaries in connection with the State University of California at Berkeley, a similar union has taken place in Montreal as recorded by the Congregationalist. It is certain that all the tides of unity are flowing toward a common sea. May we not believe them to be, in the fine phrase of James Martineau, the tides of the Spirit?

Two very significant assemblies, significant for Canada and for all Christendom, were held in Montreal, Oct. 1, to inaugurate the first joint session of the four theological seminaries affiliated with McGill University. The Anglican, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian "Colleges" have united their faculties for common instruction of all of their students in at least four-fifths of their theological curricula, thus making a faculty of sixteen professors, with much larger classes than they have been having, and much better opportunity for specializing in their respective subjects, since the number of lectures required of each is much diminished. The first of these meetings was held in the University Assembly Hall in the Royal Victoria College, presided over by Principal Hill of the Congregational College as the first dean of the united faculties, and addressed by Rt. Rev. Dr. Boyd-Carpenter, for twenty-seven years Bishop of Ripon, and Dr. Robert E. Speer of New York. Bishop Boyd-Carpenter came from England especially for the occasion, making thus his first visit to Canada.

In the evening at the Windsor Hotel a banquet was attended by over five hundred and fifty men of the city, mainly laymen belonging to the four communions directly concerned in this movement, under the auspices of the men who have been the moving forse in bringing about this co-operation of the colleges, and who intend to erect a central building on or near the McGill campus, for the administration and conduct of this united work, within a year or so. Mr. William Birks of the great jewelry firm of Henry Birks & Sons, and a governor of McGill University, probably the most active member of this group of laymen, was appropriately the chairman of the evening, and the famous guests of the afternoon were again the principal speakers. When the evening gathering broke up, shortly before midnight, few could escape the feeling that a new epoch had begun for Protestant Christendom. The lectures have commenced with a new interest and enthusiasm and with more students than before in probably all of the colleges concerned.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly.

On the Broad Pacific

I have several times remarked in the course of these letters that the Tenyo Maru is a Japanese ship. The crew is entirely Japanese, and with the exception of the captain, purser, doctor and freight clerk, all the officers are Japanese. The reason for using any non-Japanese on the official list is two-fold. The Lloyds give a lower rate of insurance to ships whose captains hold an English seaman's certificate; and the presence of an English or American captain makes a much stronger appeal to the general traveling public.

In my last letter I spoke of the stop at Honolulu. There seems little reason for such a stop so far as traffic, either passenger or freight, is concerned. One of the provisions of the United States marine is that no business shall be allowed to ships of other nations between ports of the United States. This applies to all coasting trade. And by a seemingly impossible interpretation of that clause, the Hawaian Islands are included within the meaning of the term "coast ports." In consequence, not a pound of freight or a passenger can be carried to the Islands by the ships of the Japanese line.

Of course this provision is quite in line with the wholly selfish and unneighborly policy of artificial "protection" which has made the United States odious in the minds of many other nations, and is awakening many of our own people to the unsocial tendency of our theories of commerce. The problem is presenting itself afresh in connection with the traffic of the Panama Canal, and whether our government shall insist upon the same policies of offensive exclusiveness which have characterized its commercial program for many years yet remains to be seen.

Probably the only reason why this Japanese line calls at Honolulu at all is the increasing Japanese population of the islands, and the traffic which may extend so far as to prohibit trade freedom beyond Honolulu. Great cargoes are brought from the mother country to the Japanese of Hawaii, and this trade will grow apace. Several of our ship party stopped over at Honolulu, but no tickets are sold from our coast to that port, and a month is the limit of the stop-overs on tickets through to Asia.

The stewards are, as I said, all orientals. But they are not all Japanese. The Chinese are in about equal numbers in the crew and among the dining-room and cabin stewards. In the dining saloon the Chinese all wear blue jackets or shirts, cut much after the style of a base-ball sweater. Some of them come almost down to the knee. The Japanese wear white jackets, and are further distinguished by the fact that just at present they all wear broad bands of black crape on their left arms, as a sign of mourning for the late Mikado.

They are such little chaps that it is almost amusing to see them scurrying about the ship at their different tasks. But they are a clean lot, the Japanese custom of the hot daily bath being kept in remembrance even on ship board. They are very attentive and courteous. The chief difficulty in their stewardship lies in the fact that they know very little English, and beyond the simple orders to which they are accustomed they are likely to be very much "at sea"

Nearly every evening there has been some sort of an entertainment, either gotten up by the passengers or given by the ship people. Of course one always expects a concert or two, and the list of passengers on the Tenyo Maru includes several with gifts as musicians. Twice we have had moving picture shows. The top deck is wide and well arranged at the rear with an opera space for games or entertainments. There quite a large audience can be seated, and from a little improvised cabinet at one end the "movies" are projected upon a screen. We have had classic, humorous, dramatic and "wild west" scenes displayed. And when you have nothing else with which to fill an evening, even a moving picture show is not to be despised.

One evening we had an athletic exhibition. We hardly know yet from what place the participants came, whether the crew or the steerage. But the deck was arranged with a large square, covered with mats, in the center, while all about were draped the flags of the different nations, and the electric lights covered with Japanese lanterns, making the place look very gay. The program included wrestling between some eight or ten pairs of brown and brawny athletes stripped to a loin cloth, and evidently masters of the art. The bouts were conducted with due ceremony by the announcer and the judge, in Japanese costumes appropriate to their offices.

Then there were fencing contests in the Japanese style. The contestants put on heavy masks and gauntlets, and each was armed with a heavy two-handed fencing sword. The contests were carried on with much shouting by the swordsmen, but the movement of the game was rather slow. Two bouts were fought and then, as in all the former cases, one of the contestants was ceremoniously pronounced the victor.

The ju jitsu matches were by far the most interesting features of the evening. The opponents were lightly but handsomely dressed, and their movements were rapid and skilful. It was not difficult to see why the knowledge of that art might be very useful as a physical discipline and a means of defense.

There has been some sort of contest nearly every afternoon. These have been arranged for the passengers, and have included nearly every variety of stunt from basket and baseball to potato races, contests in driving nails (for ladies), and races which included such handicaps as threading a needle, eating a biscuit and drinking a bottle of ginger ale, and then whistling a tune as you went past the judge, to prove you had actually "downed" both of them. Tonight comes the captain's dinner, for which the dining saloon is being profusely decorated, and after that there will be a fancy dress party for those who wish to go. I thought perhaps I would go disguised as a gentleman, if I can find the make-up.

We lost a day this week. When we crossed the 180th parallel, the one directly opposite Greenwich, it was necessary to follow the custom of omitting a day on the westward trip, even as one is added on the eastward. So we passed directly from Sunday to Tuesday. The printer made a mistake and dated the breakfast menu cards "Monday, October 7." But by lunch time the error had been corrected, and the cards read, "Tuesday, October 8." So between breakfast and lunch time there was an interval, constructively, of thirty hours! So we have all lost a day. Of course we had all planned to do a lot of things on that ill-fated day. We shall never get caught up now until we cross the Pacific in the other direction some time, and get our lost day back.

Our Sundays have been very pleasant in weather, and the services in the main saloon well attended. On some of the lines, notably on the Atlantic, the captain reads the English service. But on this ship the passengers are allowed to make their own plans, and the young men of the Christian Association have taken the initiative in finding preachers. Once a Methodist has preached, and once a Disciple. In each case we were not allowed to forget the common fellowship of all true believers, on land and sea, and the ties of prayer, that bind all the saints, as with gold chains, about the feet of God.

Tenyo Maru, at Sea, October 12.

So long as we dare to think that secular life must be a separate existence from the spiritual, that earthly engagements cannot be fulfilled in uninterrupted communion with God, just so long are we living outside the purpose of God, contradicting the majesty of our true nature and denying the efficacy of the gospel.—H. W. Webb-Peploe.

Short Pastorates: Their Cause and Cure

By John Gerald York

The topic suggests a prevailing condition among our churches, which is depriving them of great power and usefulness, and also makes against the development of a stronger type of minister. The churches which are the most influential today are those whose past and present history is marked by few pastoral changes. The ministers who are the most widely known and whose efforts have been proved and are proving the most productive are those who have been privileged to remain a long time upon certain fields. The denominations which have the greatest list of well-known men, men whose reputation has gone beyond the community of the local church throughout the state and the nation and the world, are those which make it possible for their pastors to remain indefinitely upon their fields. There is little sympathy in the country today for that system which limits to a minimum the time a pastor shall remain in one place.

It is an acknowledged fact that the average pastorate of all our denominations has been too short. It has been too short for most men to become acquainted with the membership of their own church. Too often a church has been obliged to give up its pastor just at the time when he was beginning to know the local situation and thus become more useful in his parish. No man can do his best work on a field until he has become thoroughly acquainted with every condition thereon. No man can really become acquainted with the average country church within a year, or even three years, and much less can a man in the same time know every member of a parish with a membership of from 500 to 1,500. A man must know his people in order to be able to work well with them, and he must not know only his own flock, but he must know the community in which he lives.

A Problem in Religious Pathology.

In this paper is to be discussed not only the fact of short pastorates, but also their cause and their cure. These two words, cause and cure, shall form the nucleus for what follows. The topic concedes that the prevailing condition is wrong, and in asking for a cure, suggests that the condition is a disease. There is before us then a problem in religious pathology. The short pastorate is a disease. It fastens upon both the churches and the pastors. It is a disease which needs to be cured. In order to know best what remedy to apply and how to apply the remedy, it is quite necessary to know the causes of the disease.

The Cause of Short Pastorates.

Their cause is legion. For convenience we may classify these causes as those for which the church may be held responsible, and those for which the pastor is responsible. It will not be possible here to mention everything in the churches that operates against long pastorates. Only those causes which are most apparent to the writer will be mentioned. Even then there will be too many things seen that prevent continued years of usefulness by the minister in one place.

One thing to be mentioned is the general view among the churches that the pastoral office is only temporary. They are too prone to feel that a pastor soon wears himself out, loses his hold and exhausts his resources. Failing to realize the value of a long pastorate, too many churches hunger for a new voice and a new message. Of course, in our church polity, no pastor has a life lease on any one church. But our churches need to know the weakness of short pastorates and the value of continued years of coöperation with one leader.

The tendency for a change and for something new seems to have become ingrained into our American life. This tendency has run riot too long. Variety may be the spice of life, but variety also kills. A variety of pastors has killed a good many churches, for which the pastors themselves were not alone responsible.

In the selection and calling of a new pastor too little is made of following the guidance of the Holy Spirit. If our churches could know that their pastors were God-sent, would act upon that conviction, the pastoral relation would not be so easily broken, and stronger ties would be woven between pastor and people, between brethren in the church, and between the churches and God. In this matter let the churches say, "Thy will be done."

Financial and Moral Support.

Another weakness on the part of the church is its lax support of the man they have called to minister unto them in spiritual things. Many a church has put a man in its pulpit and then stood off to one side and said, "Now go it; we'll see what you can do." The church fails to see that it must stand by him, uphold him, defend him, encourage him and coöperate with him. He needs all the support the church can render. The church too often becomes unfaithful in its financial obligations to him, neglects his physical needs and expects him to do the work whether it is with him or not.

Then, after the flush of the first few weeks or months of a new pastorate has passed, the members of the church have forgotten how they once gathered around their new pastor with words of appreciation. No man can live on applause, much less can a minister. But many a pastor has worn himself out, only to wait in vain for kindly words of cheer and compliment. He needs to be told frequently that his efforts are appreciated. Where kind words are spoken better results will follow.

This failure on the part of the church is due largely to thoughtless negligence. It will do a church member no harm to think occasionally of his pastor's feelings and of the yearnings of his pastor's heart. Many a pastor has exhausted himself in his efforts, only to lie down at night smitten with disappointment because of the cold unresponsiveness of his people.

Nearly every church has its troublesome member, who so easily becomes guilty of unfair, and sometimes cruel, criticism of the pastor. It is altogether too easy to say unkind things about a minister. It is absolutely impossible for one man to be perfectly satisfactory to every member of the church. But it is quite possible for any one to be lenient toward what he considers the pastor's weaknesses, and he ought in the name of God and humanity to refuse to become a slanderer. Vile criticism has never saved any man, but has killed many a pastor who might otherwise have been very efficient. James says of the tongue, "It is a restless evil, it is full of deadly poison."

The Pastor's Part.

As for the pastor's responsibility for short pastorates, it may be said that too many pastors have a migratory disposition. They want to be on the move, and cannot stay long in one place. They seem to feel that the railroad companies are in need of the revenue derived from moving them from place to place. Many a minister has moved too frequently for his own good, and if he feels that disposition growing upon him, he should combat it. He may long for new worlds to conquer, but he is quite likely to leave an unconquered world behind him, when he moves to a new field.

Then, too, many a pastor has to move frequently, because of his incompleteness of preparation for his work as a preacher. He soon uses up his "barrel," and not being able to grind out sufficient new material, he has to go somewhere and open again his sermonic repertory. Too many preachers subsist on their "barrel," and for such there is need of more Niagaras.

Some ministers lack mental vigor and physical energy to grapple with the local situation, and failing to see their way through must move, by their own default. Their previous preparation may have been good, but they lack the staying quality. They may even be brilliant, but failing to secure the results they desired have condemned the church and gone elsewhere. A pastor needs grit and determination to fight a thing through, if not on one line, then on another. He may fail, but if he does fail, let him do it fighting. Such a failure often becomes a minister's greatest success.

Probably one of the most notable causes of short pastorates on the part of the minister is his desire for promotion, and he must not be too severely criticised for this. A minister has as much right to aspire to higher position as any one else. It is when this desire becomes inordinate that it becomes an evil. There ought to be promotion in the ministry and our denomination is sadly in need of some fair and workable system of promotion. A man ought to work his way to the top in the ministry as in any other occupation. But when a man leaves a field simply because a larger church has called him, and when he knows his work has not been completed where he is, he injures himself and the church he leaves, and may find himself unequal to the larger task.

Sometimes a minister moves from sheer financial necessity, or it may be that a larger salary is the deciding element in what is often published as the call of God. It is not fair, however, to condemn a minister because he desires more money. The average salary he draws is lamentably inadequate, and most pastors are today using up every cent of their salaries to meet their meager living expenses.

Desire for Promotion.

A minister must support his family and give them every advantage for social, intellectual and spiritual development, as well as care for their physical necessities, and when an opportunity comes to him to do all this more easily by receiving a larger salary, let us pray that men will not be too severe in their judgments upon him. No man can do his best work when he is underpaid and many a pastor's efficiency has been increased simply by increasing his salary.

Many a time a minister has thought his work done when he simply fails to recognize his further opportunity. He has worked awhile, accomplished some things and is unable to see anything more to do. There is great need in the ministry for men who can see things that need to be done, and who have sufficient initiative to go about it and do them. We need men with ability to grapple with a situation and work out its salvation. Too many times has a minister faced a perplexing situation and said to himself "I cannot do it," and has turned away leaving his task undone, and perhaps it never is done. Every minister in considering a pastoral change for himself should consider this question, Is my work done and have I done it well? A conscientious man will have many causes for regret on leaving a field over the work he has done or left undone.

A minister is by nature sensitive to adverse criticism and many a time has he allowed himself to give up his church because of unkind words about him. I suppose he must expect quite a little of that, and he generally receives it in not too scanty measure. Some men run from it too easily. He is not to be blindly insensitive, but he must not allow himself to be too easily discouraged by unfair criticism. Everybody receives it and he must take his share like a man.

There are men in the ministry who have too little regard for the divine will in the selection of another pastorate. Ministers should be just as dependent upon God's will in this matter as should the churches. This is a serious charge to make against a minister, but we may as well face an evident fact.

The Cure for Short Pastorates.

Too many causes for the short pastorate have been discovered. These things ought not so to be. These causes should be obliterated. If the short pastorate is a disease, the way to attack the disease is to attack its cause. A disease which is brought about by so many germs, will require several different remedies. There is no one remedy that will act as a sufficient eradicator for all these germs. Neither will it be possible to patent a concoction that will prove a panacea for the disease wherever it occurs. It is proposed here to prescribe several remedies which if taken according to directions ought to prove a sufficient antidote for the poison in our ecclesiastical system. It will be attempted to propose remedies that may be taken alike by both churches and pastors.

The Remedy of Prayer.

The first remedy proposed is that of prayer for divine guidance in the selection of a pastor. This is prayer with a specific purpose. The members of a church ought not to be unwilling to come together and pray earnestly that God may direct them in their choice of a pastor. By thus praying they recognize their dependence upon God, and God will hear the call of those in need. The minister who receives a call should also take it immediately to God and seek his will, his guidance and his blessing. This places much of the responsibility upon God and he will see to it that the union he is thus permitted to bring about will be fruitful in the advancement of his kingdom.

This suggests another curative element, and that is that both church and pastor should recognize that God has brought them together. Abiding under such a conviction, there will be greater hesitation about breaking asunder the union thus effected. A church deeply convinced that God has sent a man to them will be more ready to unite all its resources in coöperation with the under-shepherd of Jesus Christ. A minister who is persuaded that he has been led by God's guiding hand into his field will be more sensibly responsible to God for the best welfare of the church, and will not consent to sever the union, until he is sure that God's hand is directing him elsewhere.

Church's Obligation to Define Its Own Needs.

The church about to call a pastor should make a careful consideration of the peculiar needs, advantages, and problems of its own field and endeavor to discover a man who may reasonably be expected to be just the man for the place. No one man can fit in everywhere, much less can one minister be expected to fit any and every church. There have been too many misfits, and such a union cannot but result in serious leakage somewhere. But it must not be expected that any one man will be manysided enough just to fit into any angle that may be discovered on a field. Every pastor has his limitations, and the churches will do well to be kindly considerate of his deficiencies. Let the church study its own evident needs and choose the best man it can find adapted to that situation and then determine to pull together, for better or for worse, and heaven's benediction will surely attend.

This will require a careful and proper investigation of the minister under consideration. The words careful and proper are used advisedly. Many churches do not investigate carefully and many others are so careful as to become actually improper. What the church really needs to know is the man, and a man cannot always be known by his record. That truly is a decisive factor, but not always to be the sole ground for final decision. The church pulpit committee should be composed of men who are able to know a man when they see him and meet with him for awhile. They should use their own judgment of a man and take him for what he appears to them to be worth. It will not be possible here to give complete instructions to a committee, as to how to select a new pastor, and the advice to churches to make a proper investigation of the man being considered, is offered here simply as a remedy for short pastorates, the bane of too many of our churches.

Having called a man to look after their spiritual welfare, the church should give him the best chance possible to succeed. The material equipment of the church has a great deal to do with the success of the minister. Too many churches are content with an inadequate building, poor song-books, poor organ, poor Sunday-school facilities, and blame the pastor because he cannot fill the church building, when oftentimes people who are used to having things clean and nice in their own homes will actually refuse to go to a dingy, dilapidated church building. Give him adequate financial support, and let every pastor determine to keep his living expenses within the limit of his income. He will need to be fed and clothed well, and ought to pay his bills just as any other decent citizen. He will need also the moral support of his people. Let them speak kindly of him in their homes and before their children. Praise his efforts and emulate his character, create respect and high regard for him. Thus may be opened the way for him into the hearts and homes of many others, making it more possible for him to lead them to Jesus Christ and to help them in the development of a noble Christian character, and prolong his influence for a goodly service with the church.

Minister Is God's Messenger.

The ministry is an office ordained by heaven and the minister is God's messenger. The church is also a divine institution and it is God's agency for the promotion of his kingdom. The two brought together are the most potent factor in the regeneration of the world. A lost humanity is today hanging absolutely helpless upon the arms of the church as they are extended through the agency of its ministers and any who will carry the message of eternal salvation. No other institution has that message. God has given it to the church and the church must give it to the world. It is its humble mission to appeal to men to receive the benefits of the kingdom of heaven. It is its glory to gather into its bosom those who are being saved for eternity. In this the church is not failing. Its song is one of victory. The church has not done all it might, nor as much as we have hoped, but through it God is moving on in triumph. The church and the minister are the work of God's hands, and God continues to operate through them for the establishment of his glorious kingdom of peace and power and blessing.

Our prayer is that God may move upon his people more mightily, endowing them with more of his power, and leading them more and more into submission to his will and in consecration to his service, so that the day may be hastened when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ. As his agents we come with saving health for all peoples, for his kingdom is universal and eternal and whosoever will may drink of the fountain of life flowing therefrom, clear and pure as crystal, sweeter than honey and more radiant than the noonday sun, and receive such a refreshing that will be forever satisfying and purifying, and that fountain is God himself, for he is in the midst of the throne of his kingdom.

"The Sick Man of Europe"

By J. A. Adams

The long lingering illness of the Turkish Empire is at a crisis. At this writing the "Sick Man of Europe" is undergoing a surgical operation and the end may be the amputation of his European territory.

What a day it would be for Gladstone if he were in the Commons now! I see him standing there in all his majesty, and in that ringing voice of eloquence exclaim, "Did I not tell you thirty-seven years ago that Turkey ought to be turned out of Europe bag and baggage?" And I see Disraeli feebly attempting to defend himself against the verdict of time, the judgment day of history. Twenty years further back I also see the wily Palmerston standing in the same line of British premiers who have been discounted, defeated and degraded by the course of events.

It was on March 30, 1856, that the Treaty of Paris, which closed the Crimean war, was signed. That treaty assured the integrity of the Ottoman Empire and left all of its European territory in the deadly grip of the "unspeakable Turk." It was Palmerston's treaty, that is, it embodied his policy. Berlin assembled at the German capitol to divide the spoils of the war between Russia and Turkey. When that congress adjourned it had overthrown the former Treaty of San Stefano and adopted the settlement which bears the name of the Treaty of Berlin. What had the Treaty of San Stefano done? It had secured for the Christian provinces of European Turkey almost complete in dependence from the brutal power at Constantinople. What did the Treaty of Berlin do for these provinces? It put them back, with the exception of a small part of Bulgaria, into the hands of the "unspeakable Turk," and once more "preserved the integrity of the Ottoman Empire." And when Disraeli went back to London he boasted that he had brought back "peace with honor."

A Harbor View at Constantinople.

It always makes me warm under the collar to read this passage in British history. It was a shameful thing. What was the motive? Mostly the desire to make Turkey a barrier to Russia. For that reason the Jingoes liked it and Disraeli was proclaimed the hero of the hour, and the Queen made him the Earl of Beaconsfield, while Gladstone was assailed by a mob.

But an unrighteous peace cannot stand. A solemn voice in the past exclaimed, "There is no peace for the wicked." Turkish rule was not only wicked, but it was an immovable thing in the tide of modern progress. Something had to happen in the interest of progress and the still higher concern of human welfare. This something has happened. The victorious Allies are at the gates of the Sultan's capital. They are grinding the "integrity" of the Ottoman Empire into dust. And the civilized world rejoices. It is a victory for progress. Another long step in the march of mankind. Palmerston and Disraeli were only politicians. Gladstone was a statesman, a Christian statesman.

Fortunately Gladstone's party is now in power, or to be more accurate, providentially it is so. If the Tories held the reins in Downing street there would be another arrest of history. The protests of Chistendom would again be defied, the yearning voice of humanity again stifled. Balfour would not dare to go quite as far as Palmerston and Disraeli went, but it is an immensely good thing that he is not at the helm.

But what of the future? I put this question to Dr. James L. Barton, secretary of the American Board, a few days ago. Dr. Barton is not only a secretary of the greatest foreign missionary organization in America, but he also is a missionary statesman. He knows Turkey and the whole Eastern situation as few other men in the country know it. I said to Dr. Barton, "How much is there in the charge that this is only a war for territory, an attempted land grab on the part of the Allies?" He replied that the criticism might apply in some degree to Servia and Montenegro, but that underneath all was the protest against Turkish despotism. Bulgaria can never forget the past or overlook the present And who that has read history can forget the "Bulgarian atrocities," when a British consul found piles of massacred women and children in Bulgarian towns and when the Bashi Bazouks left the streets dripping with blood?

But, I said, how much can we expect from the Bulgarians? Much, was the secretary's quick reply. In some respects they are one of the finest peoples in Europe. They are a splendid type of humanity physically, and they are most orderly and law-abiding. A traveler cannot go a hundred feet across the line into their territory without knowing that he is in another country. They live simply, largely on milk (without germs in it), and in war they are almost irresistible. That they have been preparing for this struggle is not to be doubted. They had quietly purchased military supplies, and when they hurled themselves upon the Turks, weakened by the Italian war and somewhat demoralized by the lack of authority at Constantinople, they soon had the enemy fleeing for home.

But what do you think should be done with Constantinople? I asked. "The morning papers," said Dr. Barton, "speak of a plan to put the city in the hands of an international committee, and I rather like the suggestion. It has been tried with success at Shanghai, and I see no reason why it might not prove feasible at Constantinople. Certainly it would be a hazardous piece of business to let any one power take possession of this great stronghold, for Constantinople commands the Mediterranean. Whoever is there will hold the key to the eastern situation.

"As to the final outcome of the crisis," continued Dr. Barton, "I feel sure of great good. It will put an end to many of the restrictions and repressions of religious work. It means a wider door to Christianity."

Undoubtedly the secretary is right. God is keeping watch above his own. "It has taken a hurricane of Divine judgment," says a London editor, "to destroy the hollow mockery of the Concert of Europe, and to visit upon a cruel people the atrocities and unrighteousness of the centuries. This is the lesson that today is written in blood in the Balkans. The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly small. Men can defy the laws of God; they may for long years appear to thrive on the diplomatic juggleries that disguise injustice and oppression; but retribution comes at last, and often in a tornado that devastates, while it sweetens the world."

"The great Balkan victories," says another London editor, "are the victories of an idea, not of mere brute force. The most powerful friends of the Allies are the invisible ones."

I like that expression. In a great sermon, recently preached, Dr. Gunsaulus said, "Men overlook the 'Silent Partner!'" The "Silent Partner," I think, has been with the Allies.

—For the sixteenth successive year two sisters in New York, whose identity has not been disclosed, have sent to the superintendent of the life-saving service a thousand dollars to be distributed at Christmas among such former members of the service as are now disabled or in want. Incidently, the generous gift is useful in calling public attention to the unwarranted delay of the government in providing a pension system for the service.

—Among the many suggestions that followed the loss of the Titanic is this; that a definite place in a particular lifeboat be assigned to each passenger, and that he be required to find it as soon as he boards the ship. A Japanese steamship company has adopted the suggestion. It issues to each passenger a numbered coupon that represents the place in the lifeboat reserved for his use in case of need. Theoretically, the plan is good, but whether panic-stricken passengers would adhere to it is another matter.

The Use of Memory

Sunday-school Methods of the Past and the Present

By William E. Barton

I recently heard an address on modern methods of Sunday-school teaching in which the speaker more than once spoke slightingly of the old-fashioned method of teaching children to memorize Bible passages. He said that to get the meaning of a passage, or an estimate of some Bible incident or character, was far more valuable than merely to learn the words. I talked with him afterward and he said he had not intended to overlook the value of memory work, that indeed in practice he did not overlook it but that he had undertaken to emphasize what to his mind was a thing more important. But as a matter of fact his was not a matter of emphasis nor of mentioning an important thing to the momentary neglect of one less so, but the rather slighting reference to a thing which he brought before his hearers only to disparage it.

Now this is not unlike some other addresses I have heard to Sunday-school teachers and others, and it moves me to say a few words about the value of memory training, and of the memorizing of passages of Scripture.

The One Does not Shut Out the Other.

First and foremost, I deny the inference that one must choose between learning the words and understanding the meaning of the Bible. To know the words of Holy Scripture is not of necessity to neglect the meaning; and I dissent in toto from the suggestion that Bible meanings are so naturally opposed to Bible words that there is any considerable danger of neglecting the meaning in the teaching of the words. A very good way to learn the meaning is to learn the words; and the learning of the words is a very convenient introduction to the teaching of the meaning.

Our children ought to be learning more words of various good sorts. They ought to learn word for word great poems, great orations, great descriptions. When I went to school we had fewer school books, but we had "readers" which we learned almost of necessity; and when we had completed the Fifth Reader, wondrous possibilities opened to us. We already had read extracts from the great writers of English; and now we had "rhetorical readers," with Othello's Apology, and Rienzi's Address to the Romans, and Willis' poem of David's Lament over Absalom, and Marmion's reply to Lord Angus, and Spartacus' Address to the Gladiators, and Hamlet's Soliloquy, and Poe's "Bells" and "Raven," and two or three hundred more. And we learned them. We not only read them in class, but we read them between classes till we knew them. When the book was new we culled "pieces" from it to speak on Fridays; and when we ceased to use it for this purpose, we knew the book and so did the rest of the school.

Old-fashioned Method Good.

Now I want to testify that the old-fashioned method of committing these things to memory was good. In saying this I brand myself as a back number. I am prepared to be told that at the same age the children of this generation are writing learned papers on great authors, instead of knowing bits and scraps as their fathers did. Yes, but out of the vast knowledge of the present can the boys and girls remember any better lot of bits and scraps than their fathers, or fit them against any better background of the mind?

In my day there were teachers; now there are educators. Therefore I appeal to educators to teach children more good literature, even if you teach them less about literature. And I could even wish that "learn" were a different sort of verb than it is, and that I might exhort you not merely to teach it to them, to "learn it to them." This would be bad grammar, I know; but I always have maintained that the words "I'll teach you better" are weak compared with those "I'll learn you better." "Learn them good English," or teach them good English, if you like the expression better.

Commit Bible Verses.

But now as to the learning of the Bible. Let children learn the Bible. Let them commit verses to memory. Their memories are very retentive; they need to be trained to be more so. It is not hard to learn Bible verses.

A man says, "You know I have no verbal memory; I cannot commit a passage of Scripture." Yes you can, and your children can. You and they can learn together.

Read the passages aloud. Do not simply think them; frame the words with your lips; speak them in a natural tone. Say them over and over. The act of speaking tends to fix them in memory.

Do you object, "This is mechanical; old fashioned, quite opposed to modern pedagogy?" You are mistaken; it is thoroughly scientific. It is the right way to do it and to teach it. Your children can do it, and you can do it.

Worth Doing.

Moreover it is worth doing. Don't believe the modern educators if they say it is a thing of little importance. The words they speak may be true, namely that it is better to know the fact and the spirit than the mere words of Scripture. But the inference is not true, namely that you must choose between fact and word or spirit and word, or that the word is a bar to the fact or spirit. They are wrong in what they imply. The word itself is important, very important, and they are not teaching it as they ought.

Teach your children the very words of great poems. Let them read one-fourth as many books and know them. Let them cut out nine-tenths of the novels which now make up the greater part of their reading, and read a very much smaller number of very much better books.

Poor Excuse.

And don't be afraid to learn a little more of the Bible yourself. Don't think you excuse yourself by saying, "I have no verbal memory." You have a verbal memory, and you can remember the words that you think are worth learning. The poorest verbal memory can be cultivated, and the verbal memory of all children ought to be cultivated. There is no habit more destructive of verbal memory than the reading of great quantities of trash that is not intended to be remembered. There is no better way of strengthening the verbal memory than storing it with choice words, which express beautiful truths. Find these in the great poets, philosophers and orators. And be sure that the very best place to find it for yourself and your children is in the Bible.

And to pastors who have defective memory for words and phrases, I commend this method:

Take a short, beautiful passage, and commit it by repeating it aloud, over and over and over. Take first one line, then when that is fixed in mind the next, and then the two together, reviewing all the time from the beginning till you get it all. Do the same next day with another passage, and review the first. Gradually you will fill your mind with the gems of literature and of holy Scripture. And not only so, but you will be astonished to find how your verbal memory grows, and how convenient it is to have these passages in your mind and at your tongue's end.

It seems as though man could never escape from himself, and yet, when shut in to the monotony of his own sphere, he is overwhelmed with a sense of emptiness. The only possible remedy here is to radically alter the conception of man himself, to distinguish within him the narrower and the larger life, the life that is straightened and finite, and can never transcend itself, and an infinite life through which he enjoys communion with the immensity and the truth of the universe. Can man rise to this spiritual level? On the possibility of his doing so rests all our hope of supplying any meaning and value of life.—Eucken.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A MOTHER OF MANY

By Winifred Henshaw.

It seems especially fitting that in this day of feminist ferment the most inspiring educational innovator should be a woman. Dr. Maria Montessori, in her "Houses of Childhood," seems at first glance simply to have discovered and applied for herself the kindergarten system. But certain significant distinctions must be made. The mere review of Dr. Montessori's points of equipment—medical science, psychiatry, and experimental psychology—indicates how far we have traveled since the middle of last century, when Froebel opened a new world to women teachers. The highly trained woman is now no longer merely the devoted, enthusiastic follower; she also experiments and creates. Dr. Montessori, while learning much from her French forerunners, Itard and Sequin, has passed beyond them.

House-Reform Scheme.

Coming to the work of education from the sphere of medicine, through the study and treatment of defective children, Dr. Montessori brought a breadth and keenness of view not always possible to the professional teacher who is apt to be limited by tradition and habit. Circumstances, happily, gave her a fair field for new beginnings. The opportunity came to her in connection with an extensive housing-reform scheme, instituted by the Roman Association of Good Building. Vast blocks of tenement houses in the poor quarter of San Lorenzo in Rome were being made habitable and hygienic; tenancy implied, according to the plans of the Association, the advantages of a communal system, by means of which each tenement should have baths, dispensary, club, and cooking and laundry facilities. The crowning point of completeness was reached when the Director, Signor Edoardo Talamo, invited Dr. Montessori to undertake the organization of day nurseries, or infant schools, in the model tenements.

Working Mothers Benefited.

The parents—mothers as well as fathers—going out to work, the children under school age (this is six years old in Italy) would otherwise have been neglected and in danger, and would have grown up "ignorant little vandals." The Casa dei Bambini thus arose. Like the other social rights of the tenants, it is free—covered, so to speak, by the rent. The children between three and seven are gathered into a large room, with access to the central courtyard, and guided in their work and play by a teacher who lives herself in the block (this sort of "Fraternity" being made possible by the housing reforms!) and who is in daily touch with the mothers. The school is in the home; it is, of course, small, and, partly for this reason, partly because the children's ages are miscellaneous, there is no attempt at the class-teaching, with which we are familiar in our schools. This, however, forms no part of Dr. Montessori's plan.

"House of Childhood."

The parents feel that the school belongs to them, and the regulations encourage this feeling, demanding cooperation and an attitude of goodwill "towards all persons connected with the House of Childhood." They must send the children clean, and wearing a suitable pinafore; and once a week at least the mothers should consult with the teacher, giving information about the children's home life, and receiving advice as to treatment.

The inaugural address delivered by Dr. Montessori at the opening of one of these Houses of Childhood, throws a most interesting light upon the feeling of the mothers towards the school. "The mothers adore the Children's House," she observes; "they often leave sweets or flowers upon the sill of the schoolroom window as a silent token." In another place we note how a portion of the courtyard, once the receptacle of rubbish thrown from the windows, became inviolate—it was part of the children's garden, and the mothers could see them at work. This same inaugural address emphasizes other points of vital interest to a modern community. These schools supply in a satisfying way modern working women's needs.

"Today the women of the people who live in these remodelled houses may say, like the great lady, 'I have left my son with the governess and the nurse.' More than this, they may add, like the princess of the blood, 'And the house physician watches over them and directs their sane and sturdy growth.'" Inanimate things—means of transit, articles of daily use—have been largely communised; the communising of persons—nurse, teacher, doctor—is beginning.

The Transformed Home.

There is no criticism of the mothers' going out to work and leaving their "natural duty"—that, it is assumed, is a matter of social and economic evolution, calling the working woman to take her place among wage-earners. "What will become of the home," one asks, "if the woman goes away from it? The home will be transformed, and will assume the functions of the woman." Certain "material functions" are being communised, in fact. Dr. Montessori goes on to suggest how far-reaching such development might be, for example, in the direction of nursing and cooking. With her new resources, it will be possible for woman to become more of an individual, no longer merely "the source of the material blessings of existence;" to be loved for herself, "not as a giver of comfort and repose."

And these possibilities are growing, not in Utopia, or even in the pages of "Women and Economics," but in the very world, in the Roman Quarter of San Lorenzo, once a byword for wretchedness and vice.—The Freewoman.

The Children's Bureau

In the selection of her staff, Miss Julia C. Lathrop, chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Commerce and Labor, has recognized the value of the co-operation of men and women in work for human betterment. As assistant head of the bureau, she has chosen Lewis Merriam, of Salem, Mass. Prior to this appointment, Mr. Merriam was acting chief of the division of revision and results in the census bureau.

Now a woman librarian-translator is called for, and the Civil Service Commission has just announced that it will hold an examination for the position, which will pay $1800 a year. An educational training equal to that required for a bachelor of arts degree and at least five years' practical library experience are essential qualifications. Applications for the position will be received until Nov. 18.

Miss Lathrop's plans for the administration of the bureau for the first year are about perfected. The work of the bureau is to be concentrated, for a while at least, upon the question of the mortality of infants and the birth rate, with a view to aiding those influences that are already working for the standardization of the methods of birth registration in the United States. "We cannot begin to know anything about how many children are lost or why they are lost until we know how many are born," said Miss Lathrop in a recent interview.

Moreover, birth registration affords protection to children. It is a social and educational advantage for the child to have his name permanently recorded. The questions of property inheritance and of establishing one's residence and citizenship, become, sometimes, very important ones.

"Above all," Miss Lathrop is quoted, "it is important in connection with the child's right to an education, and most obviously at the present time it is important with respect to the child going into employment. The legal quibbling which has made the anti-child labor laws of many States ineffective has been in most instances based on the impossibility of the enforcing executives knowing from definite and legally acceptable records the actual truth regarding the age of the children in question."

Upon Julia Clifford Lathrop, "the first woman to be honored with the headship of a federal bureau, representative of a movement which is the 'first expression of the nation's care as a nation for all the interests of all its children,'" Mount Holyoke College, at its 75th anniversary, conferred the degree of doctor of laws.

Miss Lathrop was one of the speakers at the recent National Suffrage Convention in Philadelphia.

I Am Captain of My Soul

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
Thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud;
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond the place of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the shade;
And yet the menace of the years
Finds, and shall find, me unafraid.

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll;
I ame the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

Over $11,000 was given in response to a call for $8,300 when the new $25,000 house of worship at Shenandoah, Iowa, was dedicated November 17, by Geo. L. Snively. F. D. Farrell is pastor.

Montgomery, Alabama, under the leadership of O. P. Spiegel, has set January 12 for the dedication of its new church. Such announcement is the highest expression of faith; the foundation has not been laid.

Madison Avenue Church, Huntington, W. Va., dedicated a new house of worship out of debt by raising $9,000 on Nov. 24. J. W. Yoho is pastor. Geo. L. Snively was present on the big day.

G. J. Chapman is happy in the beginning of his third year with First Church, Joplin, Mo. The annual meeting showed 115 additions during the two years and the finances on a safe cash basis. The sum of $450 was given to missions during the past year.

Dr. Frederick E. Lumley was installed as professor of Social Science and Home Missions in the College of Missions, Indianapolis, Nov. 19. Dr. Lumley brings to his unique task a finished equipment as a scholar and teacher.

The type of optimism that has made the Church Extension Society so triumphantly successful is reflected in its secretaries' notes elsewhere in the opening sentence: "We are now well on the way toward the second million, having $15,000 to begin with to date!"

At the last international state C. E. convention, Orange County, Calif., was adjudged the banner county of the state. At the last county convention just closed at Santa Ana, the First Christian Society of Fullerton, Bruce Brown, minister, was awarded the banner county of the state. At the duction is too obvious to need to be stated.

South Billings, Montana, dedicated its new house December 1. That congregation was established by the Home Society only about a year ago. It will soon be self-sustaining. This is the second church planted in that ambitious western city within five years.

The death of O. A. Carr, president of Carr-Burdette College in Texas, removes from the brotherhood's active life a man whose name has been well-known and whose work has been fruitful for many years. President Carr had been ill for several months. He died at Sherman, Tex.

Will the ingenuity of ladies aid societies ever be exhausted? Here are the ladies of the Disciples' Church at Sciota, Ill., engaged in the task of collecting "dead-beat" accounts for the local merchants. The business men of the town have given all their old bills into the hands of the church women and they may have all they can collect!

C. R. Stauffer the new minister at Norwood Church, Cincinnati, writes enthusiastically about his Sunday-school with 423 present and a fine offering for Home Missions, and tells of the good prospects before the church. The pastor will hold an evangelistic meeting in January, assisted by Miss Una Dell Berry as musical director.

The Men's Bible Class of First Church, Niles, Ohio, is enjoying a splendid growth in attendance. On Nov. 17 the attendance was 112; Nov. 24, 132. The growth is said to be affecting the entire school. The total attendance for Nov. 24 was 411 with an offering of $22.77. Allan T. Gordon, the pastor, says that they are enjoying the largest congregations in the five years of his labor with his people.

A former member of St. James Street Church, Boston, Mr. Robert H. Gross, has offered to pay half of the mortgage on the church if the church will raise the other half before Jan. 1. The amount of the mortgage is $2,300. An earnest effort is being made to meet the condition of this generous offer. Louis H. Stine, the pastor of this church, gave a banquet recently to the men of the congregation.

A chair of American Missions is something new in our educational institutions. Professor Lumley, who recently took his doctorate at Yale College, was formally installed in that important office in the College of Missions at Indianapolis, November 19. The wisdom of such an enterprise will be vindicated in the years to come by the elimination of blunders through incompetent workers. American Missions call for the tallest intellects, most courageous hearts, and most efficiently trained leaders, of any mission field in the world.

E. L. Frazier, veteran preacher of Indiana, died at his daughter's home in Indianapolis, Nov. 19. Mr. Frazier was seventy-four years old. He had recently been pastor at St. Petersburg, Fla., but was compelled to relinquish his labor last June on account of failing health. The funeral service was conducted by T. W. Grafton of Third Church, Indianapolis. Burial was made at Franklin, Ind., the scene of one of Mr. Frazier's earlier pastorates. Among his other pastorates may be mentioned Kokomo, Ind., where he was twice minister; Dayton, Ohio; Alliance, Ohio; Champaign, Ill.; Mattoon, Ill.; Erie, Pa.; Ashtabula, Ohio, and Morristown, Ind.

In connection with the Federal Council meeting in Chicago this week a special feature is the annual gathering of the Council of Women for Home Missions representing Women's boards of Home Missions of nine denominations. For Wednesday an executive session is announced. For Thursday a mass meeting will be held at the Moody Bible Institute, to which all are cordially invited. The afternoon session beginning at two o'clock will have much of interest. The Rev. Charles Gilkey will give an address on "Home Missions and the Social Question of Today." Rev. James A. Francis, D. D., of Boston will have as his subject "The Menace of Mormonism in our National Life." Prominent women of all denominations and from East and West will be present.

That the million dollar campaign of A. E. Cory and Dr. Royal J. Dye is getting something besides the dollars was evidenced at Buffalo, N. Y., when C. H. Ploper, pastor Forest Avenue Church of that city, declared his desire to go to China as a missionary. His desire was at once laid before the Jefferson Street Church, of which B. S. Ferrall is pastor, and the congregation voted with great enthusiasm to guarantee his support. A young physician holding a position in the Marine Hospital in Buffalo, was led to consecrate his life to missionary service in Africa, and his support was volunteered by a single member of the Richmond Street Church.

The Oriental Mission Study class under Dr. Willett has completed its visit to Japan and Korea and is now in the midst of China.

A sufficient number have already registered for the second section of the class to guarantee its success. This section will sail from New York on February 8 and join Dr. Willett in Cairo on February 26 where the two sections will unite and travel under his leadership through Egypt, Palestine, Turkey and Greece, thus giving the new members of the class the added advantage of all that can be transmitted from one to another concerning the round-the-world mission study tour. It is not yet too late to join this class of students of Bible lands. Edward A. Henry, University of Chicago, will conduct the second section to the point where it joins Dr. Willett's party.

A Practical Contribution to Christian Union.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, has just closed an evangelistic meeting for Bethany Baptist Church of Washington, D. C. He says he had no difficulty in preaching the gospel in a Baptist Church! "I preached the same sermons that I preach in my own pulpit and took the confessions of those who came forward just as I do in my own work. My fellowship with the pastor, Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson, and his people is as cordial and as sweet in my memory as though I had been laboring for a church of the Disciples. Mr. Stevenson preached for me on Sunday and conducted the Lord's Supper. Our nightly services were seasons of real fellowship." Doctor Ainslie adds that he accepted the invitation to hold this meeting moved by the desire to "make a contribution to Christian union."

Our Reproach Not Theirs.

It has just come to the knowledge of the Board of Ministerial Relief that in one of the richest counties of one of the states in which the Disciples are strongest two men who had given their lives to the New Testament ministry passed their last days and died in the public infirmary. They had both spent and been spent in the service of Christ and his church. Through many years they had "endured hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ" with no chance for saving against old age. It was no reproach, but under the circumstances rather an honor, that when their strength was exhausted their purses were empty. And with good grace they could subsist on public provisions, for few men had contributed more than they to the real public wealth and welfare. But it is a reproach and a disgrace to the churches that they had served and built up that they should have been treated as outcasts in the very years when honors should have been thick upon them.

Colleges and Sunday-school Workers to Co-operate.

Disciples Colleges and Sunday-school leaders have announced the formation of a Religious Education Commission whose function shall be "to formulate educational standard for elementary and advanced teacher training courses, and for teacher training courses for special departments; to issue critical reviews of available literature in harmony with the standards established; to design plans for stimulating religious leadership; to formulate and recommend plans calculated to improve the teaching function of the Church, and other educational interest of the Disciples of Christ as in its judgment may be considered advisable." The Commission is composed of the Sunday-school superintendent of the American Christian Missionary Society, ex-officio chairman; three members to be appointed for a term of three years by the Association of Colleges of the Disciples of Christ; three members appointed for a term of three years by the National Sunday-school Field Workers' Association of the Disciples' churches; one representative of each of our publishing houses editing supplies; and a representative to be appointed by the Canadian Provinces.

Well Equipped Assistant Becomes Pastor.

The friends of Richard W. Gentry, until last week, director of religious education a Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, will congratulate him on finally accepting a pastorate of his own in a field suited in every way to his brilliant and consecrated talents. Mr. Gentry has for nearly ten years been working as assistant pastor in such large cities as New York, Chicago and Kansas City, with a short period spent in field work for the Missouri Bible College. He now goes to the pulpit and parish of Winfield, Kan., Church where he has ample opportunity to exercise his rare gifts of leadership, scholarship and true pastorship. This is his first adequate pastorate, but he brings to it an equipment of experience which few young men possess. The Winfield Church numbers 450 in membership, with a new and well appointed house of worship costing over $30,000. It takes no prophet to predict that the student life of the two colleges there will feel the impress of his personality and his message in a very vital fashion, while the church will take on new life, especially in its Sunday-school department, through his leadership. Mr. Gentry begins his new work at once.

Foreign Society News

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts on the Annuity Plan. One donor had made several gifts on this plan before.

A friend sends $1,200 as a personal gift for the support of a missionary for two years. Many thanks.

The Foreign Society lost a good friend in the death of E. L. Frazier, Indianapolis, Ind. He was a Life Member of this Society for many years. He stood by the work faithfully. He was a true gospel preacher and delighted in seeing the Word sounded out to every creature.

Herbert Smith reports 112 baptisms at Lotumbe, Congo, Africa. Twelve of those baptized walked a distance of 200 miles. They were seven days on the journey. He says the church will not begin to hold the crowds that are coming. One hundred baptims are also reported at Bolenge and seven at Longa.

Mrs. L. F. Jaggard, Monieka, Africa, writes, "Tuesday night, August 15, 1912, in the little two-room mud cot, the first home of the missionaries at Monieka, twenty-two couples were united in Christian marriage by the missionaries.

G. E. Miller, Mungeli, India, reports three baptisms at Barela and four in Bhulan.

"Miss Gretchen Garst is with us and we are very happy together. She is the one needed for this Akita kindergarten, we all feel sure."—Rose T. Armbruster, Akita, Japan.

Dr. C. L. Pickett, Laoag, P. I., reports 1,439 patients treated during the month of September. His receipts for the month amounted to $251.83. He reports twelve additions to the church. The interest in the Sunday-school is good. The work is in a most prosperous condition and he is encouraged.

Miss Rose T. Armbruster says: "A young woman school teacher was baptized last Sunday. A young man is preparing for baptism in November. Fourteen women and girls and ten men and boys were present at prayer-meeting last week. The Methodists and Presbyterians and Disciples in Akita have a union prayer-meeting the first week in each month. Next week the Bible woman and I start out for an evangelistic trip through the country district."

Miss Mary Kelly, who has just reached Nanking, China, on her return from her furlough in America, writes, "When I arrived at the South Gate I was greeted with the explosion of firecrackers and 'my little ones in Christ Jesus' awaiting me. Those whose cheeks were bathed with tears when I left, met me with shining countenances and praises to God on their lips for my safe return. Oh! the joy of being wanted so much! Their welcome was so cordial and the expressions of love so genuine that I felt as I had often felt before, that I am a member of a very large family who are trying to redeem His lost ones."

The ten leading states in their gifts for foreign missions last year were as follows: Ohio, $64,516; Missouri, $35,570; Kentucky, $31,181; Illinois, $28,454; California, $28,173; Indiana, $22,776; Iowa, $17,854; New York, $11,765; Pennsylvania, $11,076; Virginia, $10,694.

Last year the Foreign Society expended money on the foreign fields as follows: Japan, $56,146; China, $98,248; Tibet, $8,061; India, $56,927; Africa, $31,324; China, $98,-248; Philippine Islands, $41,143; Hawaii, $132; Cuba, $4,784; England, $9,582; Scandinavia, $5,114; Turkey, $300.

Leslie Wolfe and Dr. W. N. Lemmon and J. B. Daugherty, missionaries at Maila, P. I., report twenty-eight baptisms during the month of September. Dr. Kline has reached the field and has baptized two. The tenth anniversary of the Filipino Christian Church was observed Oct. 11, 12, 13. The missionaries say that every session was crowded and enthusiastic.

A Summer Home in Winter

Owing to the expected crowded condition of Eustis during the coming winter season there is a greater demand for good accommodations than can be secured. At the earnest solicitation of friends Mrs. W. T. Moore has consented to offer six large rooms at The Palms for the accommodation of Christian people. A northern lady, who is an expert caterer, has been secured to take full charge of the comforts of the guests, and enjoyable home living is assured. For particulars address The Palms, Eustis, Florida.

At our November meeting the following loans were promised: Altus, Okla., $1,500; Keifer, Okla., $300; Covington, Va., $1,000; Campbell, Mo., $2,000; Cohassett, Minn., $500; Alliance, Nebr., $1,500; Big Cabin, Okla., $300; Edmond, Okla., $500; Ashdown, Ark., $1,200, 6 per cent; San Dimas, Calif., $7,500; Asherton, Tex., $300; Northcot, Kan., $400; Chewelah, Wash., $600; Lebanon, Ore., $2,500; Antioch, Okla., $300; Baldwin, Ga., First Church, $300.

For the purpose of securing payments on delinquent loans he also visited Anderson, Columbia and Sumter, South Carolina; Dublin and Fitzgerald, Ga.; Greenville and Talladega, Ala.; Coltewah, Bristol and the colored church at Johnson City, Tenn., and Seventeenth St. Church at Nashville, Tenn. These church did well in the payment of their loans.

The associate secretary has been doing work in Missouri and Indiana.

The demands on Church Extension money continues to come in two to one that we can answer.

An annuity of $1,000 was received from Indiana and $200 from Missouri.

Benevolent Association

John H. Wood, of Winder, Ga., has been called, and has accepted the work of superintendent of missions under joint support of the American Christian Missionary Society, the Georgia Christian Missionary Society, and the National Benevolent Association. One-half of his time will be given to the benevolent work. He will look after the association's work in all of the Southeastern states. Those who know think this a most fortunate arrangement. It is a step toward the right kind of unification.

The annual meeting of the Benevolent Association will be held in Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, on the evening of Dec. 10, 1912, at 8 o'clock. All life members are invited to be present.

C. V. LeCraw, the newly elected president of the Southern Christian Home, at Atlanta, has begun his work with enthusiasm. He has gathered about him a group of strong committee men and women.

F. W. Harlow, of Hebron, Ind., field man for the association in Iowa, has resigned.

We have in the neighborhood of 450 children in our six orphanages. Several of these homes are in debt. The winter is here. Their needs will increase. More children will knock at our doors for admittance. What shall our answer be? Shall we allow the children already committed to us to go hungry?

The association has under its care at the present time a large number of children that are defective in one way or another, and hence are regarded as undesirable. Homes that swing open their doors with glad welcome to the child richly endowed with physical beauty are closed tight to the physically weak, the mentally slow, the little freckled face with fiery red hair and irregular features. Few are the homes that in the unselfish spirit of divine love willingly welcome into their loving protection the orphan with crooked eyes, a hunched back, or maimed in some one of the almost countless ways in which the race is afflicted. This class is in especial need of the tender, loving care that only a Christian home can give. If this is denied, the church must provide sheltering love in some other way. The Christian orphanage is the church's answer to the appeal of this most needy, deserving class. For instance, there is the case of Goldie. Her mother is dead and her father unable to care for her. She has no relatives who could or would provide for her. At some time in her life she was seriously burned, as a result of which she carries an ugly scar, deforming the lower part of her face. Notwithstanding the fact that she is bright and agreeable, this deformity prevents her from securing that love and affection which every child's heart craves. When she came to the home she said, "I want to be brought up like a Christian lady." We can think of no atmosphere in which that child would be more likely to grow into beautiful womanhood than that of a Christian home. It might be truly said of her that there is no one to love her but Christ and his church. JAS. H. MOHORTER.

Attention, Indiana Preachers

We want a correct list of Indiana preachers in the next Year Book. Please look over the list in last Year Book and if there are any mistakes write me at once. If there are any names that should not be listed or if any are omitted that should be listed let me have the information promptly. If any are improperly marked or classified please make the correction. If you have changed your address please give us the information. New preachers that are not listed and those who have recently moved into the state should give us the necessary information that their names may appear. If you expect to move or change your address soon give us the proper listing for next year. A postal card giving the desired information will be appreciated. L. E. MURRAY, Cor. Secy.

New York City Notes

Lenox Ave. Church has remodeled their church at a cost of about $1,000 that has so completely changed the appearance that it looks like a new building. This congregation is being led by Z. T. Sweeney, and demonstrating the power of the old gospel to win hearers and hold them even in New York.

Flatbush Church is working early and late, making preparation for a new building. F. M. Gordon knows no defeat, and the church stands loyally by him. The much needed building will be soon realized.

When Leroy F. Carter entered upon his work at Borough Park Mission Church, Sept. 1, there was a Sunday-school of sixty-eight in atendance. During October there was an average attendance of 155.

Alexander Persionoff spent several days in the city on his return to Russia. On Sunday, November 10, he spoke at East Orange Church, at the morning service, to the delight of all, and in the evening preached at the Russian mission. Monday he was present at and addressed the meeting of our New York City ministers. JOSEPH KEEVIL,

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the three years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that has even been offered to Sunday-schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., one of the most successful social service leaders of men and young men among the Disciples, thus writes concerning this series:

"I have used THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM with the Greyfriars Class since October, 1908—the first issue—and it is the only Sunday School help that is really worth while for adult classes. It has actually built visible, tangible things for this municipality."

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these clesses in the study of Social Reform.

The Best

Many Sunday School classes will wish to study the life of Christ in 1913. They want the very best text for young people's or adult classes that can be found. This is simply to remind them that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned, as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is being widely used in Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A. classes. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Maeterlinck

MAURICE MAETERLINCK was the subject at a recent meeting of our Minister's Union.

The reader of the paper gave most of his attention to refuting the positions of Maeterlinck. I am not sure that we ever get to know a writer by treating him after the fashion of the deadly parallel column. Maeterlinck is an eagle, and he who uses not his wings will not be able to follow him. Perhaps truth ever eludes him who comes without the heart of the artist and the soul of the poet. Sympathy is the key to the heart of the universe, and to that of any man.

The discussion also was narrowly professional. I give the substance of the remarks, a sentence from each of several present.

"I have not had time for such writers and therefore do not know anything Maeterlinck wrote."

"If the reader of the paper is right I think our young people ought to be warned against this writer."

"I am not a college man and I was glad to know of this author's teachings."

"I think his writings ought to be excluded from the libraries."

"I heard The Blue Bird read once. I thought it good."

"Paul and Peter are good enough for me. I consider my time too valuable to waste on such writers as this man."

* * *

"Our young people are reading such writers. We ministers ought to know them so that we can warn them. Such writers can also help us in illustrations."

There were other comments of like character. Don't you think we were too professional, too ministerial? I suppose I ought not to abuse that great word "minister" by so using it; but we lacked breadth, vision, openness. We thought of ourselves as defenders of the faith; not as seekers of the truth. Christ took great risks with the truth. It has usually carried with it the power of defence. Because man and truth are made for one another truth will not be overthrown.

* * *

We interpreted a great imaginative writer with literalistic rules. The conflict of the poet and mathematician in literature and religion has not entirely passed.

How greatly enriched would be the message of ministers if they would live much with the great writers of literature. They are interpreters of life, of truth, of the Gospel. They are just what the minister aims to be in his pulpit ministrations. He is not a reader of the Gospel—he is an interpreter of it. Writers like Maeterlinck will push out his mind to see the new unities in the great realms of God's Kingdom.

We must judge writers as we judge men. We do not refuse to learn from men because they disagree with us. Nor should we close a book the moment we discover that the writer has said some word we have regarded as untrue. It is difficult to state truth. My friend who read the paper before our Union on Maeterlinck attacked his view of sin. He said Maeterlinck said there was no sin. Now a bald statement like that can never measure the philosophy of any great sin. We find him saying: "Does not evil itself become precious so soon as it has gathered therefrom the deep-lying diamond of repentance?" I do not know just what Maeterlinck believes, but I do know he makes me believe in truth, beauty and the eternities. Almost any paragraph from his essays swings you out amidst the stars, among which must be some that guide to Bethlehem.

We need to know that the best commentaries on the Scriptures are the most vital books on life—life so mysterious that all books together but poorly measure its passions and outreaches.

* * *

When I came from the meeting of the Union I took down a volume of a favorite author to see what he said of Maeterlinck. I quote a sentence or two:

* * *

"The one real struggle in modern life is the struggle between the man like Maeterlinck, who sees the inside as truth, and the man like Zola who sees the outside as the truth." "Maeterlinck's appearance in Europe means primarily this subjective intensity; by this materialism is not overthrown, it is under-mined." "He brings something that is more real than realism."

* * *

It matters not one atom how often the lulls of materialism and scepticism occur; they are always broken by Maeterlinck.

If this be true Maeterlinck is a friend. Sometimes ministers like other average people, fail to recognize their friends. It will be better for all if we seek truth as well as to hold fast that which we already have.

* * *

Ministers are most serviceable when they are least professional.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Social Survey

The Federal Creche

The Children's Bureau of the Department of Commerce and Labor began active operations upon the passing of the necessary appropriation bill by congress on Aug. 23, 1912. The act establishing the bureau contemplates investigation and report upon all matters that have to do with the welfare of children and child life among all classes of people, in particular the problems of infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertion, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children, employment, and legislation affecting children in several states and territories. It is not the intention to encroach upon the rights or relieve the states from the duty of dealing with this subject, but to obtain the information to enable them more intelligently to meet these problems; in other words, the bureau is to become a clearing house for information regarding actual or pending legislation affecting children. The bureau, under the leadership of its secretary, Miss Julia C. Lathrop, of Chicago, whose training has eminently fitted her for this position, has already begun the work of bringing together the existing material on the subjects within its scope. Another of its immediate tasks is an original investigation of infant mortality, directed especially toward the social aspects of the problem. The bureau will also coöperate with the organizations, governmental and volunteer, now working for adequate birth-registration, a most important factor in reducing infant mortality, because in many states where they are not properly recorded, local social agencies have difficulty in learning of the births of children. That the work of this new bureau will be of greatest importance to the future of our nation cannot be doubted. The wonder is that the government has not undertaken such a task years ago.

England and the Balkan War

Thirty-four years ago, largely at the instance of the British plenipotentiaries, Macedonia was handed over again to Turkish misrule. In commenting upon the part played by Great Britain in the Berlin Congress, Mr. Gladstone could only confess that his country had taken the side of servitude instead of liberty. It is altogether unlikely that the decision of 1878, which has since been a source of shame to every loyal British subject, will be repeated by the present government. The premier recently made a speech at the Guildhall which, according to Mr. D. C. Lathbury writing in the British Weekly, will rank among the greatest deliverances on foreign policy that have ever been made by an English minister. "The map of Europe," said Mr. Asquith, "has to be recast . . . The victors are not to be robbed of the fruits which have cost them so dear." That the allies have it in their power to take Constantinople is generally admitted, and perhaps before these words are read the city of the first Christian emperor will have fallen, and the sultan will have betaken himself, together with his women-folk, to Asiatic shores. It is equally admitted, however, and apparently by the Bulgars themselves, that once taken it will rest with the concert of European powers as to what will be the future status of the city that guards the Golden Horn.

732 A. D., 1453 A. D., and 1912 A. D.

The fall of Constantinople, should it take place, will make 1912 one of the dates which the school-children of 2912 A. D. will have to memorize. It is always difficult to appreciate fully the significance of history in the making. To get the proper perspective we have to go back 1180 years. In 732, the followers of Mohammed lay in a vast semi-circle upon the northern shores of Africa and the curving coast of Asia, one horn touching Gibraltar and the other the Bosphorus. All Christendom was alarmed when the Saracens, pouring out of one of the horns of the crescent, crossed the Pyrenees and established themselves in the plains of Gaul. We all know what happened when in that year the followers of Islam were driven back by the Franks under Charles Martel, the "Hammerer," at the battle of Tours. Had the Crescent instead of the Cross been victor, we might now be studying the Kuran instead of the Bible, minarets instead of cross-crowned towers might have risen from our churches and the harem skirt have been in fashion for a thousand years. The crisis at the other horn of the crescent did not come for several centuries, until, in 1453, after a prolonged siege, Mohammed the Second passed in triumph through the gate of St. Romanus and dismounted at the principal door of St. Sophia, the great Christian house of worship. On May 29, in that year, says the historian Gibbon, the Conqueror "performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars." Will the most renowned of mosques become once more the most renowned of Christian churches? Will Islam be driven officially from European shores? Will the sultan cease to be a European sovereign? It looks as if this would be the outcome, if only the jealousies of so-called Christian nations in Europe do not prevent. Should this be the outcome, to whomever the actual control of Constantinople may fall, it will be an event which will make the year 1912 a year from which to date a new epoch in the world's history.

"Cease Firing!"

The war-clouds hanging over Europe seem to have dispersed, at least for the time being, and there is less probability than there was a few days ago that Russia, with its pan-Slavic proclivities, will come into conflict with Austria. The Servians entered Durazzo on the Adriatic Sea without firing a shot, and were actually welcomed by the citizens, and Austria will find it difficult to keep the Serbs from the permanent possession of this port. The latest news from the front is that an armistice has been signed which calls for the cessation of hostilities for eight days preparatory to final peace. It is said that Bulgaria is willing that Adrianople shall remain Turkish, provided the Ottoman government pays an indemnity of $250,000,000. Every Christian must rejoice at the sight of peace, except, perhaps, those for whom a general European conflict is necessary to complete their ready-made interpretations of prophecy. These adventist and cataclysmic seers must wait a while longer, before proving that these latter days are "worst" and not best.

Delayed by Dollars?

Why is it that our country has so long delayed the recognition of the Republic of China? Has this postponement of what heretofore we have always done with promptness anything to do with the recent loan to China by the fiancial interests of the six allied powers, of which we are one? Is our failure to recognize the new republic due to the dollar diplomacy which has become in recent years an outstanding feature of the department of state at Washington? An international law of precedence and a natural republican sympathy have always caused us to be among the first in the recognition of sister republics. It is true that in the present instance the question of recognition is somewhat involved by the assumption on the part of European governments of a quasi-benevolent protectorate over China. But this is not a case where two rival powers are contending for the control of government. There is not the slightest possibility that the Manchus will ever be returned to power. Desperate in its need of funds for current expenses, and especially to pay off the army—for unpaid soldiers are always a menace—the Chinese government has asked for a loan of $300,000,000. The bankers of the six nations floating the loan, aided by the diplomatic agents of their respective countries, have been able to prevent China from borrowing elsewhere, and are in a position practically to force the republic to take this money on their own terms. It is claimed that there is a combination of these governments which refuses to recognize China until the present government agrees to the onerous terms dictated by the bankers of these six nations for their own profit. No one can object to the proper protection of big loans, but it would be most unfortunate for the progress of Christianity and for the continued friendship of China for this country, if the new republic had even a suspicion that this nation was a party to any international Shylocking game of excessive usury.

In one respect, Canada is well ahead of the United States. In an interesting report of the progress toward church union by Rev. William T. Gunn, he tells us that, "Today in Canada there is no place where there are 150 people where Christ is not preached." We wish that could be said of the United States. If the home missionary societies could have competent support and workers, we might reach that ideal.

The Glorious Announcement

The announcement which engages our attention this week is for all peoples. Tribal chieftains take pleasure in announcing the progress of their tribes at the expense of neighboring tribes. Modern ministers of state often put forward programs for the enriching of their own people by ruining foreigners. There have been Christians who seemed to think they were not helping their church unless they assisted it in taking strength from other churches. The announcement of the coming of the world's Savior strengthened the hearts of all who loved righteousness as soon as they saw the meaning of that announcement.

In trying to serve God by giving all the world a chance to hear the story of Bethlehem we must ever bear in mind that it is our business to build up and not to tear down. We therefore search for the good in all institutions. We tell men that in Christ they can find the fulfilment of their hopes. The patriotism of the Japanese, the patient industry of the Chinese, and the self-denial of India meet encouragement from the wise Christian teacher. Christianity supplies what is lacking to make these excellent qualities more fruitful and to free them from narrowness, monotony, and emptiness.

Humanity can be improved. Savages can become civilized. Ancient evils that persist among civilized peoples can be destroyed. The saloon, the brothel, militarism, political tyranny, financial tyranny, and race antagonism will not forever plague the earth. States and cities will be organized for more efficient service for all the people. The schools will educate all the children. The churches will devote themselves without reserve to the task of cultivating good will among men and faith in the living God. This is what Christmas means. The friendless it brings now is a prophecy of universal good will.

Protests against war are more numerous than they used to be. The church of the United States is committed to the peace policy. Men of wealth give freely of their money in support of the peace propaganda. Labor organizations denounce the evils of war and of standing armies. Ministers of state dare to say that war and preparations for war stand in the way of social reform. The motives of men who advocate war ostensibly for the honor and glory of the nation but in reality for private gain are being uncovered and classed among the most detestable that ever controlled human conduct. Much that has passed for patriotism is seen to be a fraud. The minister of state who seeks occasion for war that he may obtain glory thereby is a traitor. He is appointed to save life, not to destroy it. The world is getting tired of him. The day will come when it will give him the traitor's reward.

Christmas is the children's holiday. Of course all ages share its benefits. But without the children the Christmas season would not bring great joy to any. In the church, in the home, and in the stores provision is made to meet the needs of the children. Wretched indeed is that home where there is absence of desire or of means to give joy to some child. But it is not enough to give presents and to rejoice for a season. The meaning of the Christ Child for the world will be lost if provision is not made for the happiness of childhood at all seasons. Human beings are not born into the world to be exploited by ignorance and greed. They come to be educated and to enjoy the fullest development of all their powers. Disconnect the Christmas feeling from the work of making the world fit for the children, and it becomes sentimentalism. Then any sort of pleasure will accord with the season. But make it a part of the passion for righteousness and you give its enjoyments power to uplift.

One anti-Christian practice is that of giving presents that overtax the strength and the purse. We may overtax our strength in ministering to the sick and in supporting a righteous cause and gain in self-respect. But to wear out in the interest of a formality is not sensible and the day will come when we shall call ourselves fools for doing it. The habit of giving reminders of friendship is too good to be broken. We must keep it up. We must also have a little sense along with it and the independence to act in harmony with our situation. Our aim is to cultivate friendship and good will. What we do must be governed by this aim. Conformity to custom is a secondary consideration. [Midweek Service, Dec. 18. The Fleshly School of Literature?

A good deacon in a London church once related to the writer the following incident concerning a young woman who had been a playmate in the Highland village of his boyhood, but who for some years had been "in service" in the English metropolis. Meeting her for the first time in several months, the deacon asked: "Well, Annie, what have you been reading of late?" "Plutarch's Lives" was the answer! How many American mistresses, or masters, for that matter, to say nothing of servant girls, have ever read "Plutarch's Lives?"

Making all allowances for the exceptional character of this particular instance, it must be confessed that our day is shockingly indifferent to the masterpieces of the world's literature. Outside of a relatively small circle, "Paradise Lost," "The Divine Comedy," and even "Pilgrim's Progress" are in the same class with Adrianople, Popocatapetl, and Squibnocket—nothing but names. Five-foot bookshelves and everyman's libraries do not seem to have helped much. It is one thing to have a long row of pretty books behind the glass cover of a sectional book-case, and quite another to have the contents of even one book added to the furnishing of the brain, instead of the parlor. A recent writer in the Academy says that to read classics a certain amount of detachment is necessary as well as a good deal of concentration. The first has no place in the rush of our American life and the second has given way to a love of the superficial. "Our age," this writer goes on to say, "has evolved an almost incredible anomaly, a new vice. It is the vice of reading the casual, the foolish, the trivial, without knowing them to be casual, trivial, and foolish." Heroes and heroines so loquacious that they talk on through two thick volumes, as they often did in Scott, and Thackeray, have had to give way to those of the Stanley Weyman order, with sandwich in one hand and a pistol in the other, if they are to speak to an age for whom sermons over twenty minutes long are irksome and whose motto is "Do it now!"

Our book-stores are gorged with print and our news-stands, like Joseph's coat, gorgeous with magazines of many colors. A disgorging process has become imperative, if our intellectual life is to remain healthful.

Another reason for selection and care in our reading is the present popularity of so-called realism among the leading writers of the day. It would hardly be fair to fling at them the taunt which was flung years ago at Mr. Swinburne's erotic verse. They hardly form a "fleshly school" of literature. But one might infer that the sex problem is the sole interest of the modern mind, if one judged wholly by what is to be found in such writers as Eden Phillpotts, John Galsworthy, Maurice Hewlett, and H. G. Wells, to say nothing of others. Speaking of the latter's "Ann Veronica," a writer in the Atlantic Monthly has said that what we could formerly endure only in the hyperbole of Whitman, he (Mr. Wells) will make us now endure in sober prose. If, speaking in metaphor, the human race were still in the garden of Eden, such a philosophy of nakedness might not be out of place. But as it is, such a point of view has but little to say for itself, it does not represent the highest in art, and on the score of morals cannot be defended. If we must have realism, let it be the realism of the Old Testament, where frankness produces loathing and disgust, and we are glad to turn away from a glimpse into human depravity to its opposite.

The modern problem novel never lets us out of the dissecting room, and leads too many of its readers, like some visitors to Paris, to prefer the morgue with its horrors to the beauties of Notre Dame and the sunlit waters of the Seine beside which it used to stand.

In the light of all this, what is the duty of Christian parents in the matter of directing the reading of their children? Shall they employ the "cloister" method and shut up the minds of their boys and girls in a narrow cell into which no ray of light from this world of art and beauty ever penetrates? Or shall they let their children browse at will in the land of the lotus flower? The first is impossible, the second immoral, and fraught with the greatest danger.

The Christian home has no more imperative duty than giving direction to the younger members of the family in the matter of their reading. To confine them to the insipid and impossible "goody-goody" boys and girls which figured in the Sunday-school library-book of a generation ago will probably result in driving them post-haste to the very books to be avoided. On the other hand, if they are led to love the strong, clean, outstanding characters which abound in the really great books of every age, they will create a taste which cannot be easily perverted, either by the superficial tendencies of an era that gulps down the shallow sophistries of Elbert Hubbard or by the school of writers which under the guise of realism indulges in voluptuous and insidious portrayals of the highest and holiest of human instincts.

The Weightier Message of Evangelism

Much of our curent evangelistic preaching belongs to a day that has gone forever. Sermons which produced great harvests in the hands of men like L. L. Moody are being worked over-time in the hope of producing like results. But the results do not come, and the wonder in many kinds is how, even in Moody's day, the sermon, with its array of anecdote and its appeal to the emotions, could have done what it did. It certainly served its purpose and is entitled to be gathered to the grave with its fathers.

In the preaching of today the emotional appeal has its place, but it should ever be subordinate, and greater attention should be paid to that type of preaching which deals with the perplexities of serious minded men, that growing body of choice spirits in every community who still hold themselves aloof from the Church. It will not do to say that they are depraved, or rebellious, or that they are nursing some secret sin, for none of these things is true; they have difficulties which the evangelist should recognize, and, with men like Henry Drummond for his models in later day evangelism, the evangelist must attempt to remove them. That is a much slower procedure than at present prevails, and will not make as much business for the telegraph companies, for a time at least, but it will be wonderfully productive in days to come. Planting trees gives no opportunity for jubilant demonstrations, but peoples wax rich from the fruits of their maturity.

Much of our evangelism today is impatient with anything but immediate results; men even cut down trees in order to get at the fruit. The process of cultivation seems too tedious for the evangelist. Consequently, a message that will move the emotions is striven for while the substantial citizen is allowed to pass from under the influence of the revival altogether. While the evangelist is telling us that all souls are precious in the sight of God, should we not give more attention to that class of souls over which there is much rejoicing when converted, but who all too infrequently give cause for rejoicing?

The Church has need for the lawyer and the doctor and the men and women who are known as people who bring things to pass, and the fact that they are singled out for special mention in evangelistic reports shows that the evangelist regards them in precisely that light. But they are difficult to reach. Have we made any adequate effort to reach them? Would not a message of the right character do much to enlist their interest in the affairs of the kingdom? The time has come for the evangelist to take such a consideration to his heart and conscience. As to the "how" every man must determine that for himself.

A friend recently remarked to the writer that the personnel of a certain historic congregation had greatly deteriorated in a score of years, the sons and daughters of influential families no longer filling its pews; and he assigned as a reason the decline of that type of preaching which appealed to leading spirits who sat under the ministry of men like L. L. Pinkerton and Dr. Hopson. My friend contended that such men dealt with the problems of their age as we should deal with the problems of our age, and their preaching stirred not only the conscience but addressed itself to the reason. In their day the frenzied evangelism, with its deathbed stories, the apocryphal anecdote, the appeals to credulity, was in the hands of those whom they regarded as the "sects," and into that method of evangelism the preachers among us of one or two generations ago never fell; to do so would have been a heresy.

Unfortunately in our day many so-called successful evangelists among the Disciples have adopted messages and methods which in other communions were repudiated and discarded ten and even twenty years ago. Is it any wonder that congregations should deteriorate under the influence of hundreds who have been gathered into our fellowship by the sensational and crude appeal, and who would have joined any other church just as naturally as they did our own? We do not forget that many scores of such are now in sympathy with our teachings and are faithfully at work in our congregations, but we still believe that any good that we have gained would have been conserved, and more enduring results secured with the absence of some elements from our preaching which are now conspicuously present, and with the presence of some elements in our preaching which are now conspicuously absent. If we are to reform our evangelism, we must make up our minds to leave out much that is morbid and sentimental, and put in the robust, the intellectual.. The preaching of Christ demands strength, not weakness, the ripest fruit of mind and heart.

An effective evangelistic message must place more emphasis upon what are generally recognized today as the social features of the gospel. That does not mean that we shall have no thought for individuals; individual can never be left out of account. Christ began his conquest of the world with one hundred and twenty disciples. Personality is the power that moves the world. Men should be made to feel their responsibility to God. But with that there must be insistence upon a new condition in society; there must be such an adjustment of the conditions under which men live that religion, like government, according to Mr. Gladstone's definition, will make it easy for the individual to do right and hard to do wrong.

We have already recognized this necessity in relation to the question of intoxicating drink; we bar the convert from the saloon, and the saloon from the community wherever we can. We have learned that men cannot live above their environment except as they flee from it. Bad surroundings must be changed. The evangelist may tell the convert that he must not go back to his haunt in the slums, and he may not go, but the slums remain, and to the hurt of all, when the redeemed move out. Environment is character, and it is better to change evil environment than to have the righteous move out. We must learn to move the menace as well as the man, to change localities as well as lives, to purify the city as surely as we do the convert, and the hamlet as thoroughly as we hope to purge the heart.

Such a task is today, happily, becoming self-evident. But in addition to changing environment it cannot be overlooked that of the hundred social problems with which the Church must deal there is that ever perplexing one of a living wage for the worker. The report of the vice commission in Chicago makes it clear beyond the possibility of dispute that men who would not own a dance hall in that city, or even enter one under any circumstances, contribute to the same end as does that dance hall by the payment of such meager wages to the girls in their employ, that they must "hustle" after hours, according to the accepted term among them, in order to live at all. Should the question of wages enter into the adjustment of the work of the evangelist in the new age, or shall we ignore it longer, until compelled to give our attention to it by an indignant public opinion?

Speaking of the need of the social gospel one of the great writers of our age says, "We are living in a world filled with a passion for knowledge, insistent upon facts, seeking laws and the control of powers; a world reduced to a neighborhood, with huddled aggregations, close intimacies, increasing interdependencies, bewildering complexities; a world of new economic, industrial and social relations, with complicated ethics, and withal so much to be thought about and done that in the very moment science would make all clear and orderly, there is distressing confusion and bewilderment."

With such a world inviting our conquest may we not expect the message of the Church through its evangelists and pastors to make recognition of the difficulties, the dangers, the methods of defense and attack, so that all may rejoice in ultimate victory. A world that has been transformed demands that old messages be reformed. Such reformation is an essential duty for the Church; it must also be the duty of the evangelist. E. B. B.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly.

In Fair Japan

On Monday morning, October 14, when we went out on deck land was in sight at no great distance, and the water was dotted on every side with the little fishing boats that were just finishing their night's work, and were setting sail for the shore. Soon we were in the outer harbor of Yokohama, with several other large ships and innumerable small ones all around us. We had to wait for some time for the quarantine inspection on account of the earlier arrival of some of the other liners, but by ten o'clock the Tenyo Maru was at the dock, and the passengers crossed the elevated gang-plank which connected with a flight of stairs well over on the dock.

This was the moment of good-bye for the people who had made up so pleasant a company for three weeks. Some of them were returning to their homes in Japan, Korea or China. Some were to make visits of long or shorter duration in these regions, and some were only stopping off for the day or two that the Tenyo stopped in Japanese ports, to go on with her to the Philippines. But it was a breaking up of a big family, and we were sorry to lose many friends. In some of them we had come to have special interest. There were on the Tenyo three young women who were going out to meet their prospective husbands, and we naturally watched with interest to see what the young men were like when they met at the dock. We decided that they were all very suitably mated, and consented to let the arrangements go through!

Elaborate Program Unfolded.

While we were still on the deck waiting for the ship to be warped into place alongside the pier, I was astonished and pleased to discover Prof. A. W. Place of Tokio on the dock. As soon as we could get down from the steamer he took us in charge and unfolded a program of meetings, speeches and other events which would have taken every moment of much more time than was within our possession. But it was very good to see him again, and to find the plans for our conferences and meetings so well in hand. In deference to his insistent request, we had to cut short our stay in Yokohama, and leaving the rest of the party in other hands, hurry to Tokio that same evening, to take part in the dedication of a Chinese Y. M. C. A., which American money has contributed as a means of caring for the large number of Chinese students who are now at work in Tokio.

But before leaving Yokohama we had some chance to get our first impressions of Japan and the Japanese. On the dock as the ship came up there was a crowd of some hundreds of people, the men of all grades, some wearing European clothes, as most of the Japanese in America do, but the majority in the picturesque garments of Japan, round, peaked straw hats, short work jackets, on the backs of most of which were the devices of the firms or trades for which they worked, tight-fitting trousers or drawers, and bare or stockinged feet on which were the straw of wood sandels, held on by thongs crossing the front and fitting between the first two toes, where they are held with the skill and firmness of a finger grip. The women wore the kimono-like wraps, the same sort of sandals, and no head covering save the elaborate hair construction, whose varieties of arrangement proclaim the estate and condition, whether single or married, of the wearer.

The Jinrikisha.

But we hardly had time to note even the simplest of details, for we were hurried into jinrikishas and trundled off to the Grand Hotel. As every one knows, the jinrikisha is a two-wheeled carriage for one person, drawn by a man who seems to have the strength and endurance to run tirelessly, on the level at least, and to serve every purpose which would be expected of a horse in the transportation of passengers. You take your place in the vehicle while the two shafts, which are connected at the outer end by a cross-bar, are still on the ground. Then the jinrikisha man tucks you in with a robe, and if it should be raining, puts up the top over your head, exactly in the fashion of a buggy top. Then when you are adjusted, he takes up the shafts, between which he steps, and with the body of the vehicle lifted to the level you start off on your journey, which may be a half mile or ten miles, but in either case the 'rikisha man seems to go on tirelessly. Of course if your trip is over a hilly road you will probably need a second man to push. The jinrikishas are light, have good springs, and in the cities most of them have rubber tires, so that one has no discomfort unless the road be uneven.

After taking lunch, or as they say here, tiffin, we started out to see as much as possible of Yokohama before we had to leave to keep the evening engagement in Tokio. With the same horseless carriages we journeyed out over the "Bluff," or foreign and residence section of the city, to the splendid public park which overlooks the so-called Mississippi Bay, where Commodore Perry anchored in 1854, and gave American names to several points in the vicinity. This memorable incident was the beginning of the modern era in Japan. It marked the passing of the old feudal policy of exclusion, and the opening of Japan to the commerce of the world.

Ornamental Shrines and Small Temples.

In this park are several Shinto and Buddhist shrines and small temples, apparently useful rather for ornamentation than worship, though no doubt many who go there are ready to avail themselves of the religious satisfaction of offering prayers or even more substantial tokens of regard at these shrines. Near by is a private or semi-public ground owned by a wealthy Japanese, Mr. Hara, and elaborately arranged as a landscape garden, with lotus and other flowers in profusion. The statue of the owner surveys the scene with a look of comfortable satisfaction on the face.

The chrysanthemum season was just coming in, and we met several floral processions, evidently advertisements of exhibits, either public or private. But the most interesting event of the day was an hour spent in the home of a gentleman of Yokohama, whom we met at the dock, and who has looked after our comfort in many ways since. Mr. Shinosaki is the son of a rather well-to-do Japanese gentleman of Yokohama. According to the custom of the country, the entire family lives in one house. We were taken there by the young man himself, who knew we should be interested in seeing what a Japanese home of the better class resembled.

Adopting Some Japanese Customs.

Mr. Shinosaki speaks excellent English, but his wife, a charming little lady speaks only a few words. After the custom of all Japanese homes, we left our shoes in the vestibule, and were ushered into the sitting room, or rather one of the several rooms which may be used for either social or sleeping purposes. On one side of the room were the sliding doors which concealed the shelves on which the bedding is placed through the day. The floors are covered with straw or bamboo mats, and there is almost no furniture. You sit down on your feet, with what comfort you may. It is the common custom of the Japanese, and they require no chairs. Our hostess entertained us with an exhibition of flower arrangement, which is one of the most prized of the feminine arts in this land. We had two examples of the method, one with chrysanthemums and one with the little pine branches of which they are so fond. It was no hasty arrangement of flowers in a vase, but a careful and elaborate adjustment of a very few blossoms in accordance with a scheme in imitation of nature, which is elaborately taught in the Japanese schools for girls.

Then followed the customary tea serving, which in a well-ordered household is also a matter of precise and careful detail, taught likewise in the classes on etiquette, which the Japanese regard as the most important item in a woman's education. We were also shown the family recess or shelf on which the images of the household gods are kept, and where it is the duty of one member of the

First Anniversary of Chinese Republic

By Jacob Speicher

The Chinese are celebrating their first "Fourth of July" today and it may be of interest to Americans to review some of the most important events of the first year of the young republic. It is quite remarkable that conditions in China today are almost like those of the American republic immediately after the evacuation of the British from New York City. The Chinese republic is today confronted (1) with the dangers of unpaid revolutionary soldiers; (2) with an almost unreasonable interstate or provincial jealousy; (3) with a deplorable condition of national and provincial finance; (4) with constant fear of a strong central government at Peking at the expense of such centers as Canton, Changsha; (5) with dangers on part of so-called friendly foreign powers; etc.

The Manchus have evidently accepted the republic in good faith, for when Dr. Sun Yat Sen visited Peking recently the Manchu princes made him a feast of honor and the ex-prince regent, the father of the child-emperor, visited Doctor Sun to consult with him. One cannot overestimate the benefits which will accrue to the republic by reason of Doctor Sun's visit to his former enemies. The president, Yuan Shi-kai, was able to win Doctor Sun for his state policies and also to induce the doctor to bring the hot-headed Canton republicans in closer touch and harmony with the president. Doctor Sun's self-effacement in the matter of office-seeking has proved to be a great help in the building up of a new form of government. The outstanding event during the first year of the young republic was

The Constant Need of Funds.

China has a national debt of over $1,000,000,000 silver. This was the legacy of the Manchu dynasty to the republic. The Manchus had never made up a yearly budget, but it is known that they were unable to make ends meet. When the revolution began the rebels had more money than the dynasty. At that time the people ceased at once to pay their ordinary land tax which made an annual income of 48,000,000 taels, i. e., about $36,000,000 United States. The likin tax, consisting in taxing goods and merchandise shipped from one town to another, was abolished, to the joy of the people, but it cut down the national revenue another 43,000,000 taels, i. e., nearly $33,000,000 United States. The millions of dollars gained through the Chinese maritime customs are practically confiscated by European nations to pay China's foreign debt. The young republic found itself in financial stringency from the very start. True, the Manchu court allowance was cut down from 27,000,000 taels to 4,000,000 taels, but only a small part of this sum has been paid up to date. One must marvel that it was possible for the republic to survive. The unpaid soldiers were a constant menace. Quite a number of cities in various parts of China were looted by these discontents.

At one time Tang-Shao-yi, the first prime minister of the republic, reported in a cabinet meeting that it would cost 80,000,000 taels during the first year to disband the revolutionary soldiers satisfactorily. Tang-Shao-yi has resigned his task, the time limit of the first year has come, yet no 80,000,000 taels were received for this object. The government when threatened by these unpaid revolutionary soldiers used arguments something like this, "We have no money at present, for as you know the Manchus have beggared our land. It is in your power to revolt and to break up the republic. What would follow? Chaos. And this would give the foreign powers a pretext to divide our land among themselves. We believe you will prefer to complete your noble work of establishing the republic and this you can do in that every man among you return to his previous vocation and thus become an honorable citizen of this republic." Let it be made known in all the lands of the earth that the revolutionary soldier returned to his home without pay and is today imitating Doctor Sun and other heroes. The political revolution has been completed, but the thinking world in China is being shaken to its very foundations because of the Revolution in Moral and Educational Spheres.

The influx of American and European ideas on western civilization is increasing. The amount of enlightenment that is going on in thousands of cities, towns and villages throughout China at this time will constitute one of the great landmarks in the history of China and the world. A few days ago, Wu Ting-fang, the ex-minister to Washington, was present at a meeting of young people of both sexes for the purpose of discussing ways and means for greater liberty to young people in China in choosing their own wives and husbands! Recently a young woman found it necessary to appeal to General Li Yuan Hung, the hero of Wu-Han, to restrain her father from compelling her to marry a man whom she disliked and to help her to be permitted to marry a man to her liking. That appeal constituted a seven days' wonder and "ye old custom" got a "jolt" such as it had never received. That young woman was born 100 years too early, for even among our Christians not one could be found to admit that such things can be allowed! But as belligerent suffragettes have also organized in China one is tempted to exclaim with the congressman that "we do not know where we are at!" On the streets of Kityang one constantly hears the words "equality" and "liberty," but we know that thousands of young men are using this "liberty" for an occasion to the flesh and evil. Young China is in danger of throwing off all moral restraints.

Ardent republicans have proposed to national and provincial assemblies to throw out the teachings of Confucius from certain schools, as his teachings are not in accord with republican principles. While the latter statement is partly true, China must not throw out the babe with the soiled bath-water. The Chinese are too sensible a people to do anything of the kind, although it is admitted that there must follow a decided let-up of the thraldom which Confucianism has exercised over the minds of the nation. New principles of modern civilization are now pervading the minds of the scholars, but it is necessary to hold to moral teaching of Confucius, for otherwise the Chinese race would be like a ship without an anchor in time of need. True, Christianity has taken firm root in China, but its ethical value is little understood outside of the few hundred thousands of Christians. After a Chinese has become a follower of Christ he has no enthusiasm for Confucius, though he can find no reason for antagonism. Christians object to deification of Confucius as was done by the Manchus as a check to Christianity, it was thought, and to compelling all scholars in government schools to worship at his shrine. This fight for "soul liberty" has not yet been won. Recently the head official on the board of education of the Kuang-tung province issued a statement that this compulsatory worship of Confucius would not be demanded. The provincial assembly took up the matter and the head official, who is a Christian, came in for strong criticisms, but many non-Christian members of the assembly stood by him so that the matter was referred to Peking. The reply from the capital is somewhat Delphic, so that in some parts of this province Confucius is worshipped with more zeal than ever. In other parts of the province this is not the case. The position of the Christians with regard to Confucius is that they avoid both extremes. Confucianism is a great ethical system and must become an ally to Christianity. All that conflicts with absolute religious liberty must be put aside, but Christianity would be the greatest loser if the teachings of Confucius were to be prohibited. The Christian religion has come to China to fulfill what is best in Confucianism.

The Loan of the Sextuple Group of Banks has occasioned a great deal of controversy throughout the world. The six governments supporting the position of the sextuple group have been severely criticized as it was thought that these six banks were holding the new republic under their thumbs and that China was not given a fair opportunity to borrow money from any quarter she chose. The facts are, however, that while the revenue of the republic, including a tax on salt and an increase of her maritime custom rates, would permit another loan of several hundred millions silver, it would be simply disastrous to the entire republic if this vast sum were not expended according to methods insuring up-to-date reforms. It is a grave question whether the average Chinese official can carry out such reforms in an economical manner. The sextuple group of banks simply hold that there must be foreign supervision as to the way these hundreds of millions are to be expended. The self-respect of the Chinese nation seems to demand that absolute freedom be given China in the expenditure of this loan. The six governments (United States included) hold that these banks have taken a far-seeing and statesmanlike position, a position, in fact, which will prevent financial ruin and hence the "break-up" of China.

Watchman, What of the Night?

It is past. Lo, the east is brightening with the promise of a clear and perfect day, a day in which the light of God shall lighten all the millions in China! Opportunities to preach the gospel were never better, but the day of decision has not come for the multitudes. They are afraid of a possible political reaction and they do not want to be caught in the "net." For it is conceded that if such a political reaction should take place the Christians would come in for a great deal of punishment. These timid souls have not yet been touched with the spirit of life, for when once they obey Christ, their Saviour, no possible political reaction will be able to frighten them. May spiritual power be given us living in China in order to do this work in the right way!

Livingstone's "Regions Beyond"

"Providence seems to call me to the regions beyond, and I shall go, whoever opposes. I will open up Africa, or perish!"—Livingstone.

By Sophie Bronston Titterington

THE "REGIONS BEYOND!" What a story of incredible struggle, inexpressible hardship and suffering, heroic faith and magnificent achievement do these words suggest! Yet Livingstone's work, great and far-reaching as it was, must be understood as only the initial step in the civilization and evangelization of Africa. The far-seeing missionary explorer expressed this when he said: "The end of the geographical feat is the beginning of the enterprise."

At the present time, the story of Livingstone's life and work is being rehearsed on every hand. This generation is learning a supreme lesson of how a Christian hero may live and die. A stake and flame are not always the hall-mark of martyrs. God's martyr-roll emblazons many a name the world does not recognize as belonging to that Hall of Fame. To be bound to a stake with quickly consuming fire is a slight thing compared with more than a score of years of voluntary exile, exposure, starvation, perils innumerable, consuming disease, weariness beyond expression, and at last death in the lonely wilds to a desolate, wasted, stricken man, praying with his last breath for the Africa for which he had given life itself.

Swung Gates Open for Others.

Livingstone swung the gates of Africa open a little way. Other intrepid souls sprang to take up the work his wearied feet had pursued so long and faithfully, and proved themselves of the same heroic mold. What has been accomplished since Livingstone died on his knees in the Ilala wilderness?

It was with fitting and solemn ceremonial that the dust of England's heroic son was buried among her noblest and best in Westminster Abbey. His worn, emaciated body, rudely embalmed, had been borne by the devoted, dusky companions of his journeys across leagues of tangled, tropical wilderness to the coast, that it might be taken across the sea to the homeland. One who witnessed the grand and solemn entombing—one who had not only known Livingstone, but English hearts as well—noted the deep, silent emotions of the people. He felt in his prophetic soul that Livingstone's death would be only the beginning of a new and brighter era for Africa, so long the neglected continent. Out of the fulness of this man's conviction came these words: "Heaven, which has given him this sweet rest in English earth, will assuredly bring forth fruits of his labor—of that we may be well convinced; meanwhile the work of England for Africa must henceforward begin in earnest where Livingstone left it off."

Torture of Closing Hours

Can we realize how, in his weakened condition, the awful, depressing sense of failure and disappointment must have tortured his closing hours? His work had come to a final stop in the marshes of Banguelo, and the tempter must have been busy whispering that he had little tangible to show for his thirty years of toil, struggle and privation. The long-looked-for site for a healthful mission station in Bechuanaland had not been found, nor a trade-route to the west coast by Loando, nor eastward to the mouth of the Zambesi. In his search for these he had covered the long stretches from the coast to beautiful Lake Nyassa, in Nyassaland, on Tanganyika, and elsewhere. His countrymen's long years of neglect; his failures to accomplish the things he had set himself to do, the last being to find the sources of the Nile, must have haunted his dying hours. But we may believe that the Master he had served with such perfect devotion was present in those last moments to comfort his faithful servant.

Even as he lay dying the first fruits of his labor began to appear. A message, too late to cheer the heart that had waited and suffered so long, was on its way with the tidings that England had been forced into action by the popular sentiment awakened by his appeals, and had taken definite action for the suppression of the slave-trade—that monstrous evil, the abolition of which had become the ruling passion with Livingstone. His conviction that it formed an insuperable barrier to any permanent advance in Africa, had at last become fused in the national consciousness. The new era for which in his long martyrdom he had labored and prayed was at last dawning. Henceforth there could be no minimizing of a cause for which such a life had been given.

Scotland to the Fore.

As Doctor Livingstone was a born and bred Scotsman, it was natural and fitting that his countrymen should be the first to man the breach. The Free Church led the way, and soon had "all Scotland at its back." A new, yet experienced, leader appeared in the person of Rev. James Stewart, who had long been at the head of the Lovedale Institute in Cape Colony. He had made several personal tours, following the steps of Doctor Livingstone, and knew Nyassaland and understood the needs of Central Africa, also the gravity of the problem facing the Christian world. It was not a problem to be solved over night, but one whose solution must come with the slow process of years. He proved to be in many respects such a man as Livingstone—wise, sagacious, considering each step with care—thus building securely the enterprises which must stand the test of time. His plan was to choose some spot in Central Africa, and there build up such an institution as Lovedale—religious, educational, and industrial—forming a center from which evangelizing and civilizing influences might extend in all directions. This institution he proposed to call Livingstonia.

Instant Favor in Scotland.

The idea met with instant favor in Scotland. Churches and men of wealth alike fostered it. Leaders of influence, ardent young men, on fire with zeal to accomplish something in this marvelous enterprise, gathered for the first expedition. Such was the promptness with which the scheme was pushed, that these Scottish missionaries were soon on their way. Eighteen months after that never-to-be-forgotten service in Westminster Abbey, their little steamer, the "Ilala," was sailing the waters of beautiful Lake Nyassa.

The chroniclers of that time tell us that the next year the Church of Scotland Society founded the Blantyre Mission in the highlands south of Lake Victoria Nyanza. Another mission sprang up on the eastern shore of the lake. Reaching out beyond Nyassaland, Uganda, north of Lake Victoria Nyanza, was found by the Church Missionary Society, and the Tanganyika by the London Missionary Society.

Much earnest, self-sacrificing work went into each of these missions. But soon troubles began to thicken. The lowlands proved hot-beds of fever, and the little mission burying grounds were filled with graves. No one of these stations was sufficiently central to meet the needs of the tribes surrounding the lake, and so the Livingstone Mission found a new location on the highlands about halfway up the lake on its western shore. All the enterprises had their seasons of fiery testing, but the spirit of brotherly love and helpfulness between the various organizations saved the most of these enterprises for future success. By the end of six years, the missions had taken root, and were sending out vigorous branches.

Last March to the Coast.

In his last march from the coast to Tanganyika, Livingstone found the difficulties of the way almost insurmountable. Stanley only pushed through by superhuman efforts. But God raised up a helper in a rich Glasgow manufacturer, Mr. James Stevenson, who provided the means to build a road across the great plateau between Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika, a road 200 miles long. The engineering difficulties were great, and a toll of several priceless lives was taken in the course of its construction. The value of this highway is incalculable both for the march of civilizing agencies and the passage of the gospel message.

During these years of costly progress two dangers threatened the very existence of the various missions. One was the old, old story of the slave trade, and the other the obstructive policies of the jealous Portuguese. Livingstone had declared in no uncertain terms that the abolition of the slave trade must be the first step toward a redeemed Africa. His words were sorrowfully verified in the experiences of these men who had attempted to follow up his work. Their presence meant the destruction of the traffic, since its supplies must be drawn from the tribes of the far interior. As the missionaries penetrated the country, the slave territory grew less. In fact, its doom began when the little steamer "Ilala" first plowed the sparkling waters of Lake Nyassa. But, like all long-intrenched evils, the slave trade died hard.

Its dying throes in this part of Africa came, when in 1887, the Arabs broke out into open warfare. It was the expiring convulsion of a gigantic evil. Great Britain interfered to avert the ruin of that region. British gun-boats were placed on the lakes, and British troops emphasized British proclamations. Yet it took six long years to usher in an era of peace, quiet and stability.

There are regions in Africa in the far interior where the slave trade still flourishes, but the spirit of the twentieth century is reaching even the dark corners of the earth, and these wrongs cannot continue unrebuked. We can thankfully say that in that portion of the continent most closely associated with the life and work of Livingstone, it is now practically extinct.

The commercial and material progress of Nyassaland is no less remarkable. Here, also, Scotland led the way. Steamers and other vessels ply their way on the Zambesi, the Lower and Upper Shire, on Lake Nyassa, on Lake Tanganyika, and even the distant Lake Mwero. Thriving coffee plantations exist, and agriculture is making gratifying progress. The telegraph and telephone have penetrated Livingstone's solitudes. This region, as yet untouched by the railway, is traversed from end to end by the transcontinental telegraph. From Cairo the wires have been carried southward 1,500 miles, and it only requires another stretch of 1,600 miles to complete electric communication between the extreme ends of the continent. The missionaries in the Livingstone Institution on Mount Waller have connections with the main line, and in an hour or two can communicate with their friends in Scotland. Think of the weary years during which Livingstone was without any tidings from the outside world!

What of the Future?

We are only in the opening chapters of Africa's story. What its future pages will be, God alone can tell. Much depends upon the attitude of Christ's followers. The situation is a grave one. Africa was placed second only to China in strategic importance by the Edinburgh Conference. The advance of God's messengers in the Dark Continent is being contested inch by inch, by the followers of Mohammed. Checked elsewhere, the Moslem advance in Africa is being pushed to the utmost by Arab traders. It may be that the final battle between the Cross and the Crescent will be fought on African soil. There is not a moment to lose if we would conserve the work of such men as Livingstone and those who followed him.

The Christian world should carry Africa in its heart. The Dark Continent is dotted with martyr graves. The nations of the earth have parceled the land among themselves, seeking material profit and power. But let the Christian slogan be like that of the pious navigator, Prince Henry of Portugal, five centuries ago: "Plant the Cross on some new headland!"

family, usually the oldest daughter, to make the morning offerings of rice. The arrangements by which an ordinary room is converted into a sleeping apartment, by the spreading of rugs or quilts from concealed shelves on the floor, was also explained. The rooms are very small, their size being indicated by the number of mats covering the floor. The mats are thick cushions of bamboo on a frame about three feet by six. So a room is spoken of as an eight mat, ten mat, or twelve mat room, according to its dimensions. On these mats it would be highly improper to step with a shoe, for they are chair, table, bed and all else that a Japanese house needs. All shoes must be left outside, and foreigners who live in the land or stay here long soon become accustomed to the practice, and indeed see in it much to admire.

But our time was all too short for the many attractions which Yokohama presented. So we had to leave our party to finish the program for that city, and Mrs. Willett and I took an afternoon train for Tokio, whither Mr. Place had preceded us. It only took about fifty minutes to make the trip, and about six o'clock we arrived at the Shimbashi station and were met by Mr. and Mrs. Place, who had come with their American automobile to take us to the evening's work. Not many of the missionaries are the possessors of automobiles. But Mr. Place has made excellent use of his, not only in the work of the school and mission, but in the service of every visitor who has come to Japan to study the situation in regard to Christian work. Such men as President Eliot, Prof. Burton, and Vice-president Fairbanks have had reason to be grateful that one American missionary was able to maintain at his own expense an American machine of that sort.

So we were taken aboard, and whirled (anyone who has ridden with Place would say that "whirled" is the proper word) away to dinner, and then to the new building of the Chinese Y. M. C. A., where Mr. Fisher and other friends made us sure of the welcome that was waiting us everywhere in Fair Japan.

Carlyle's House in Chelsea

By John Brittan Clark

IS THERE SOMETHING in greatness that draws great men to each other unconsciously? Here in Chelsea, Carlyle came to live some seventy-eight years ago: but Sir Thomas Moore, Steele, Smollet and others had previously lived here, and just around the corner, facing the Thames, lived Turner, Rossini, George Elliot and Whistler. The house of the last named is now the home of another artist, whose gracious wife permitted us to see the large, light studio in which Whistler worked and the little room opening off it, in which he died. Only a street away, is the house in which Leigh Hunt lived and died.

Carlyle's house, No. 5 (now 24) Cheyne Row, has nothing to distinguish it, save the great man who made it his home. It is one of a line of houses, of rather dirty brick; in the front wall is a square of white stone with a medallion head of Carlyle. The house has a basement—"sunk story"—it is called here, three floors and high attic with one rather large dormer window. The whole impression of the house, without and within, is cheerless. It was purchased by popular subscription in America as well as in Europe, in 1895, as a permanent memorial of Carlyle and his wife, and depository of all things connected with them. It is in the hands of a board of trustees, five of whom are Americans, the American minister to England, whoever he may be, being one. There is a resident custodian, Mrs. Strong, called by Conan Doyle "the buxom matron," who for seventeen years at the rate of 3,000 visitors a year, has shown with unfailing interest and courtesy all the house contains, to each visitor.

And it contains so much. Its chief treasure is the thirty-two years' occupancy by the Carlyles—"years of hard battle against fate" he called them. Somehow to me such houses always retain the personality of their great occupants, this house peculiarly. One feels it in the kitchen where Carlyle and Tennyson sat and smoked together once for two hours in unbroken silence, then shook hands and parted with "we've had a fine evening." In the room one first enters when visiting the house, at first the Carlyle's drawing-room and frequently spoken of by them as their "parlor," is the eight-legged dining-table and some of the chairs, of which Carlyle wrote in the "Reminiscences"—"Repeatedly have upholsterers asked 'Who made these chairs, Ma'am?' In Cockneydom nobody in our day; unexampled prosperity makes another kind." They are over 100 years old and have been in daily use since they were made. It was in this room that Edward Irving came in 1834 and in complimenting Mrs. Carlyle upon the appearance then, said to her, "You are like an Eve, and make a little paradise wherever you are." In this room the "Reminiscences" were mainly written. The room opening off their front "parlor" was the back dining-room in which stood the famous screen in four folds, about five feet high, on every part of which Mrs. Carlyle had pasted prints, engravings, portraits of men, women, horses, dogs, etc., arranged in artistic manner—Carlyle bequeathed it to his niece as something of special value to him.

The room upstairs above the "parlor" was the library, connected with which is a small room, said to have been originally a "powdering room," i. e., a room or "press," through the small window of which, people dressed for some function would thrust their wigged heads to have them powdered without getting powder over their garments. Here, today, stands the strange lamp—minus its once delightful shade—of which Carlyle wrote to his mother in 1843, "We have got a most beautiful lamp of the sinumbra kind and sit by it nightly over our needlework and papers really most beautifully illuminated, at no great cost. It is a device of Jane's who loves light passionately—a most innocent passion."

This continued to be the library with some radical and expensive alterations, till Carlyle was driven from it by the "intolerable" noises of the streets of growing Chelsea. Then Mrs. Carlyle made it a fine reception room and Carlyle had a sound-proof room constructed another flight up. There were many ornaments, gifts of Carlyle's multiplying admirers, in this reception room, but one from Dickens appealed to me—a green, lacquered bronze representing a boy swinging on a gate, his straw hat swung on the post, his books thrown carelessly on the ground, and on the base of the pedestal, the legend "Au Diable les Lecons." I like to think of Carlyle having such a reminder not to work too hard and I always smile at thought of Dickens' thought in giving such a thing to the taciturn, irascible Scotchman.

So one can go through every room in the house tracing in each some important phase in the life of its distinguished occupants. Here is the room in which Carlyle wrote his "French Revolution." Here is the room in which "Frederick, the Great" was written and in a case nearby is the brave letter written by Carlyle to his publisher, after the tragic fate of the first volume of that great work. Carlyle had finished this and loaned it to John Stuart Mill to read. Mill left the manuscript upon his table, and his maid, utterly ignorant and unthinking, took it as so much waste paper with which to light the fire. Mill was aghast at the loss: "How can I tell him, how can I tell him?" he said. But he had to tell him, and nothing in Carlyle's life is more noble than the way he took this dreadful loss. Let me quote just one—the closing sentence—from this letter to his publisher, announcing his loss and his intention to start rewriting it: "Do not pity me, forward me rather, as a runner that though tripped down, will not lie there but rise and run again."

Next to this in the same room, where are many personal belongings of Carlyle—his pipe, his glasses, his ink-well and worn quill pens, his personal letters to his wife (it always seems unpardonable to make such letters public, the desecration of a heart's inner altar)—is what I like next best to this sentence of noble heroism, his letter to Disraeli. Disraeli had written a most appreciative letter, offering both a title and a pension. But Carlyle, in a letter fine in its language and spirit, declines both. Neither proposition, he said, could be for a moment considered.

And next, I think, I liked best the little wax seal made by Carlyle with the sentiment he made for it, and so expressive of his brave spirit "May I waste, so that I be of use." The device is a burning candle. Carlyle's own comment upon it is most striking: "But what if I am of no use? Why then, consume still so I cannot help it. This is the end and the beginning of all philosophy; we must just do the best we can."

The Search for Helpful Silence.

On the third floor is the so-called "sound proof" room or attic study. Pianos, house noises and street noises drove the nervous man from room after room. The last straw was his neighbors' chickens. The crowing cocks almost made Carlyle crazy. "It wasn't the first crow," he said, "but waiting for the second." Writing to his sister, Carlyle said "All summer I have been more or less annoyed with noises, even accidental ones, which get free access through my open windows. At length, after deep deliberation, I have fairly decided to have a top story put upon the house, one big apartment, twenty feet square, with thin double walls, light from the top, etc., and artfully ventilated—into which no sound can come and all the cocks in nature may crow around it without my hearing a whisper of them." But the heaven of silence did not materialize. The work was poorly done and though sounds from the lower strata of living were eluded, railway whistles, bells and the like, "evils he knew not of," were more audible than ever. Nevertheless, Carlyle used it for a while, finishing "Frederick, the Great" here, then gave it over for a servant's bedroom.

Back of the house is what we would call a back yard, but called, "in the language of flattery," wrote Carlyle to his mother, "a garden." I have just come from a walk in it, and have some of the ivy, growing so profusely there, from his own planting. In this garden, Carlyle would often write by day, under some improvised awning, and late at night after hard writing, would walk, enjoying his "last pipe."

No one should visit London without going out to Chelsea and living for an hour or so with this great man's spirit, a man who, for his vital touch to life and human thought, will be more and more valued as the years increase.

Down in Mrs. Strong's cozy kitchen, by the warm fire, was a large tiger cat. "That is Frederick, the Great," we were told. "Frederick, the Great," I exclaimed, "what a name for a cat." "Yes," was the answer, "but he chose it himself. He is a stray cat and when I adopted him, I took him in my lap and said, "Now choose your name. I am going to say over a number of names and when you like one, lay back your ears.' Then I ran over a lot of names and when I came to Frederick, the Great, back went his ears. So that is his name."

How true it is that "a cat may look at a king."

The Everlasting Gospel

By Charles M. Sharpe

Mark says, "Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God, and saying, the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe in the gospel." The emphatic word and thought in this proclamation is God. It was Jesus' idea of God that gave him a gospel rather than a lament. The basis of his confidence in his own mission was the deep conviction that he certainly knew God and could declare him unto men.

He could not have delivered his message with glad enthusiasm unless he had believed in the goodness and the power of God, as well as in the essential good and glory of human life. His view of life was worthy of his idea of God, and his view of God was the source of his valuation of life. He was afflicted with no such paralyzing doubt as that of Heine who said, speaking of the sacrificial death of Jesus, "I too could die for humanity were I not haunted by the suspicion that humanity is not worth dying for." No one can think as highly of man or of men as he needs to think in order to heroic and persistent human service without carrying his thought and feeling about man up into his thought and feeling about God. The richness and warmth of his conviction concerning God will then react upon his appreciation of man.

The glory of man is his rational nature and that means his power of interpreting his life as a whole in relation to the greatest whole of all. He thinks things together and he does not feel them fully in their separation until he has related them in their togetherness. The highest and most inclusive conception which a man is able to form, and by which he seeks to unify his life and control his experience, is for him his conception of God. He may not call it God, and it may fall short of the fully religious conception. Such would be the case with one who does not live a full human life, and whose vision is correspondingly narrowed. But in so far as his conception of the nature of the unity of all things actually controls and colors his practical life he is religious.

No one could have a religion apart from this demand for unity. The unity may be conceived in various ways. It may be called "Evolution," "Autumn," "Longing," or "Consecration," but the great mass of humanity has always called it God. It is not a matter of indifference under what symbols we represent the highest reality, for all names do not lend themselves equally well to the carrying of rich and satisfying meanings. While it is true that thought can transform words it is also true that words can hamper thought. Whatever symbol or name best serves to suggest richest and most stimulating meanings is the best and truest measure of the highest reality.

Jesus found in the conception of personality with its fundamental quality of love, the most adequate and expressive form in which to embody his conviction regarding God. He spoke the name of Father, thus making the thought of God warm, intimate and tender; and not as the Jewish Rabbi or Greek philosopher who set God afar off by such names as "the All," "the Eternal," and "the Holy One."

The concept of personality has been by far the most universal and helpful means of representing deity. It must needs have been so by the very necessity of man's thinking in terms of his own life. The primitive savage thought of his god in quite naive and vague fashion as a living being with desires and powers like his own though greatly magnified. As self-consciousness grew and as man came to distinguish higher and lower, greater and lesser, richer and poorer elements in his own nature, he imported into his thought of deity all that he apprehended as best and most real in himself. But from the beginning man apprehended, however vaguely and with whatever absence of abstract reasoning that which we mean by personality, namely, self-conscious, purposive life. Since self-consciousness awoke in man he has had the germ of all that has been embraced in our most exhaustive concept of personality.

In these days, however, not everyone is able to think of God in terms of personality. Such would have us understand that this is not because personality is too high or rich a conception, but rather that it is inadequate as a final interpretation of reality. There is the scientific mind, for example, that deals so constantly with matter and motion, that tries to secure perfect accuracy of observation and measurement by the elimination of all variabilities introduced by personality. In the presence of the vast regularities of the physical universe human personality, which is the only sort of personality we know, seems to be something limited and capricious. How can it serve as the common denominator for the whole of reality? How can we think of God as a person? Is it not equivalent to abandoning our search for unity in the vast complexity of things?

The scientific man therefore talks about universal law, the life process and the like. He tries to work out theories of life conduct in accordance with these ideas. But in proportion as he takes into account all the elements of experience, all the facts of our inner psychical life, all the facts of feeling and will; and in proportion as he seeks to interpret the earlier and simpler developments in the light of the later and richer elements he will find himself approaching the realm of religion. He will find himself driven to the employment of conceptions drawn from the realm of personal life.

If the scientific man does not use such terms he will be driven to speak of the

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A TIME OF THANKSGIVING FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS

President Taft did not include the recent victories for woman suffrage as causes for thanksgiving in his annual proclamation, but some of us will include them in our list of blessings all the same. The annual convention of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association in Philadelphia was indeed a Thanksgiving meeting. It closed its deliberations on November 26, and the more than five hundred delegates turned their faces homeward.

In Independence Square.

The opening meeting was held in Independence Square, which was filled to its capacity with men and women. Five speakers' stands were placed at different points, and from these prominent advocates of woman suffrage plead eloquently for the cause. The original Woman's Declaration of Rights, adopted in 1848, was read by Mrs. Otis Skinner. The presence of Mrs. Charlotte Pierce, the only living signer of the document, lent a dramatic touch to the occasion. It was greatly desired that the old Liberty Bell should be rung at this time, but the danger of widening its historic crack made this impossible—but the spirit of '76 was out in full force.

At the evening meeting, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the association, made her annual address, and said, "The outlook for the triumph of our cause was never so bright as it is today; in ten of our states women have now full suffrage, and I can safely prophesy that in the course of a very few years, the women in every state of the union will be exercising the right of suffrage."

A Thanksgiving Gathering.

On Sunday afternoon there was a stately procession to the Metropolitan Opera House where a Thanksgiving service was held with Jane Addams, Anna F. Shaw, and Julia C. Lathrop as speakers. The Baroness von Suttner, the great writer and speaker for peace, and Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the International Suffrage Alliance, addressed the convention at later sessions. In fact the whole six days of the convention were a Thanksgiving service. The annual meeting of the association held in Louisville one year ago celebrated the addition of California and Washington to the list of suffrage states and was the greatest victory up to that time, in the sixty-three years' struggle for the franchise; but this assembly in Philadelphia has eclipsed all former records, as it rejoices over the accession of Oregon, Arizona, Kansas and Michigan to our ranks—making ten states with the right of full suffrage, and twenty-two with partial suffrage—a total of thirty-two states with some form of suffrage for their women.

Our Four New Stars.

Up to this fall, the great victories for woman suffrage have been limited to the Far West—California, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Utah and Wyoming having granted their women the same political rights as men. On November 5, four new stars, Oregon, Arizona, Kansas and Michigan were added to our suffrage flag. This is a notable advance geographically. There is now a continuous chain of suffrage states, reaching north and south from Canada to Mexico, and east and west from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. The tidal wave of equal rights has swept over the Great Divide, and is rolling down upon the plains and eastern coast. Kansas in the middle west, and Michigan in the lake region are first fruits of more glorious victories yet to come—Kansas, first of the great plains states, Michigan, the leader of all states east of the Mississippi River.

The New York Independent says editorially of this splendid advance:

"The ten suffrage states now cover an area of nearly a million square miles, which is larger than all of the states east of the Mississippi, and their combined population of ten and one-half millions of people is as great as that of all the New England states with New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland added. It is also worthy of note, that the population of the ten suffrage states, with the exception of Kansas and Michigan, is increasing from three to six times as fast as the non-suffrage states."

A Great Advance Politically.

This is a still more notable advance politically. It does not merely give the vote to more women and more states than had already possessed it, but it adds eight senators and twenty-five representatives in the United States Congress to those already representing suffrage states.

In the presidential race of 1908, the four states, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, and Wyoming, then giving the franchise to their women, represented so few electoral votes, that no notice whatever was taken of women as political factors. By 1912 two other states had enfranchised their women, and the six free states then represented 37 votes in the electoral college—and, behold, all three of the political parties become profoundly interested in women, as both actual and potential possibilities in the campaign! They not only welcomed the aid of women, but vied with each other in appealing for their support.

Women's Votes Solicited.

The Progressive party lavished attentions upon them. Woman suffrage was made a plank in their platform; women were made members of their national campaign committee, and the mail of women, all over the country, was flooded with respectful solicitations for their votes, if they had any, and for their influence, if they had none. Even an obscure, quiet person, like the writer of this article, living in a non-suffrage state, received three voluminous communications, soliciting her aid and influence, besides a request to speak at a Progressive mass meeting in a distant city. But were the women such creatures of sentiment (as they are accused of being) that they all with one accord voted for the candidate who was so loud in their praises? Not so! Four of the six suffrage states went for Wilson, one for Taft, one for Roosevelt.

Now that the four new suffrage states have nearly doubled the number of presidential electors, there is no telling what delightful courtesies the great parties may lavish on us in the campaign of 1916. Michigan has 15 electors, Kansas 10 Oregon 5, and Arizona 3—an addition of 33, making 70 in all.

This will have a marked influence upon all political parties, compelling them to stand for woman suffrage, not only nationally, but in their state platforms as well. No party can ever again ignore women or attempt a campaign without their moral and practical aid; their eagerness for the service of women will forever silence their old-time cry, "Keep the women out of politics."

A Neglected Grace

All the world is captive to a sweet voice. A poet gives as the sum of woman's charm the low, soft voice that is like spoken music. Everywhere it bespeaks for its happy possessor becks and nods and wreathed smiles of welcome.

The harsh, strident voice of Americans is the never-ending subject of ridicule for our transatlantic cousins, who have no pity for our catarrh, and make no excuse for the climatic conditions that render the voice like a rasp.

How often does one, charmed with the fresh beauty and winsomeness of a pretty face, have all illusions of beauty swept away the moment the fair one begins to speak? High pitched, as if she labored under the delusion that she was addressing you at a distance of a mile, or that you were suffering from an infirmity of hearing, she screams her confidence into your ear, until you wish for deafness. Her voice is as grating as a rasp, as loud as a foghorn. To think of having the grocery bill and other unpleasantness discussed in that tone of voice after the honeymoon was over!

On the other hand, there are people whose voices glorify them. So soft, so musical, with such a winning sweetness, the old comparison of golden-mouthed comes involuntarily to you. The simplest greeting coming from them becomes a caress, the baldest statement gains in interest, if they give to it the beauty of their voice. How tender such a low voice when you sorrow; how soothing when it speaks words of comfort in sickness! A woman is charming and lovable, no matter how plain her face, if she has only the beauty of a soft, low voice.

This grace, like others, of mind or person, may be cultivated and become the property of every woman who desires it. A course of lessons in voice culture, no matter if one never learns to sing, is worth the time and money just to cultivate a speaking voice. When this is impossible, a woman who desires to can make a very satisfactory substitute for herself. Never scream when you want to speak to a person, even if it is only a child or servant. Go to them. Speak in a low tone. Comparatively few people are afflicted with deafness. Don't speak too hurriedly. The world will wait for what you have to say. Don't try to laugh and talk at the same time. Few combinations are successful. Above all, think gentle thoughts and put them into gentle words. So shall your speech be like apples of gold set in pictures of silver, and you shall acquire that low, soft voice that is a most excellent thing in woman.—Philadelphia Press.

The office of the American Missionary Society is happy over the first returns coming in from the Sunday-school offerings for American missions. It is believed the goal of $50,000 will be attained.

Tipton, Ind., Sunday-school had an attendance of 1,153 and an offering of $85.65 on November 17. This was the final Sunday of a contest with Noblesville School. Tipton won. G. I. Hoover is pastor.

Anybody could have predicted that Fresno, Calif., Church would be led into a building enterprise with Dr. H. O. Breeden as its pastor. This it not now a matter of prediction but of announcement. Fresno Church is prospering in the vital things of spiritual life and usefulness.

College presidents and the Brotherhood unite through Secretary E. E. Elliott in urging the churches to observe Sunday, January 19, as Education Day. They set forth several aims toward which the observance of the day should tend: The enlistment of boys and girls for education in Christian colleges, the definite dedication of young men and women to preparation for the ministry and mission field and an offering for Christian education.

Second Church, Milwaukee, laid the cornerstone of a new $20,000 house of worship, December 1. The basement is already enclosed and the whole building will be ready by January 1. It is planned to dedicate it in the spring. The seating capacity of the auditorium will be 435. Mark Wayne Williams, the pastor, was assisted in the exercises by neighboring ministers of various denominations, W. H. Trout of First Baptist Church and Ben. N. Mitchell of St. Louis. On the corner-stone is inscribed the words, "That they all may be one."

George C. Aydelott, pastor First Church, Muskogee, Okla., put on overalls and jumper recently and applied for a day's work as a section hand on the railroad. The foreman did not know the minister, but most of the men did, and they enjoyed the joke when the foreman told the new "hand" that he could start work. Mr. Aydelott worked all morning. At noon, still clad in his overalls, he joined a quartet in singing several songs for the "boys." He expects to repeat his visit with the working men at other places. "I am not doing it as an experiment or to court publicity," Mr. Aydelott explained. "It is just that I used to be a working man myself and I like to get in close touch with the boys occasionally just as I visit the office workers in their offices sometimes."

Protestantism is not only in a dead standstill in America, but it is steadily losing out—so is every creed. Religion is not keeping up with the growth in population. In these words, John Ray Ewers, pastor of the East End Christian Church of Pittsburgh, Pa., opened an address at a union meeting of the twenty-five Christian Churches of Kansas City at the Linwood Boulevard Church, during his recent visit to that city. The meeting had been called to consider plans for conserving the resources of the Disciples in Kansas City and to provide for the extension of the church's influence. Mr. Ewers asked that a great auditorium and church be built in the uptown district near First Church, Eleventh and Locust streets, of which W. F. Richardson is pastor.

Just how they think of their new pastor, S. M. Perkins, at Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, is indicated in a communication from the secretary of the Sunday-school who declares that he is "in the very vanguard of progressives in matters religious," and that he has in five months "ingratiated himself into the confidence and love of an extraordinary progressive body and proved himself worthy to lead them to greater future accomplishments." Next to him, however, this correspondent puts the superintendent of the Sunday-school, Mr. C. F. Fowler, to whom he attributes much of the recent great growth of this religious education department. The following attendance figures will indicate the activity of this school under its progressive leaders: The average attendance for July was 445; August, 519; September, 667; October, 720; and for the month of November just passed, 738. Last year the average ran near 600; this year the average for the year is near to the 700 mark. On November 24, the last Sunday in the month, there were 778 present and the collection amounted to $115.50.

Laymen Conduct Special Meeting.

A series of "New Life Meetings" was conducted by the laymen of First Church, El Paso, Tex., during the week of Nov. 24—Dec. 1. For the most part the elders of the congregation were leaders on the several evenings. One service was conducted by a woman, Mrs. P. J. Rice, wife of the pastor. Such themes as the following made up the subject matter of the series: "Home Missions," "The Call of the Christ," "Religion in the Home," "Thanksgiving," "Reminiscences of life," "Going on to Perfection." The spiritual life of the congregation was appreciably quickened and several persons were added to the membership. The pastor extended the gospel invitation each evening.

Great Present-Day Tasks of the Church.

Charles Clayton Morrison, preached last week at Lexington, Mo., on "The Great Present-Day Tasks of the Church" as follows: "The Great Task of Reinterpreting Christ," "The Great Task of the Kingdom of God," "The Great Task of Personal Faith," "The Great Task of Personal Holiness," "The Great Task of Christian Unity," "The Great Task of the Disciples of Christ." The meetings were largely attended by the church membership and citizens of the community. On Saturday night following the above series a Question and Answer service was arranged in which the people manifested keen and intelligent interest. The second Sunday was an evangelistic day, Mr. Morrison preaching directly to non-Christians. There were five confessions of faith on that day. The pastor, S. Boyd White, is greatly beloved by his people. He is a commanding leader, a thoughtful and loyal Disciple of Christ, and weilds a fine influence for spiritual ideals and Christian unity in all the country round about.

Notes Omission of Christ's Name.

O. C. Bolman in preaching the Thanksgiving sermon at Pekin, Ill., called attention to the omission of the name of Christ from the Thanksgiving Proclamation of later presidents. This he declared to be not accidental. "Several presidents have been urged to issue a really Christian proclamation and have refused on the ground that they did not want to offend the Jews and other non-Christian people. We read in John's gospel of many who said 'He is a good man,' yet 'no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews.'" Mr. Bolman pointed out that the name of Christ was mentioned in the proclamation issued by Congress in 1777. "Let us unite," it exhorted, "in the earnest supplication that it may please God through the merit of Jesus Christ, mercifully to forgive our sins and blot them out of his remembrance." In one of the proclamations issued by John Adams, the same sentiment obtains and a reference is made to the "Redeemer of the World." The last President to make mention of Christ in his proclamation was Grover Cleveland. He said: "And let us through the mediation of him who has taught us to pray, implore the forgiveness of our sins and a continuation of heavenly favors."

Death of Mr. Abraham Teachout.

That distinguished Ohio layman, Abraham Teachout, of Cleveland, passed away on Sunday, Nov. 24, at the age of ninety-five years. He had been a member of the Franklin Circle Church since 1874 and a Disciple since 1851. His interests in the work of the church were many. For thirty consecutive years he served as treasurer of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, which office he filled until his death. For many years he was an active member of the Board of Trustees of Hiram College and a liberal contributor to its various interests. Every permanent building of the college was erected under his supervision and the present modern library building was wholly contributed by him. He helped to start the Church Extension Fund with a gift of $1,000 and lived to see it pass the million mark. His interest in the ministry was unbroken and this he expressed by making a regular contribution to the Ministerial Relief Fund, besides making small gifts to many needy men as he found them. For more than a quarter of a century he was a wise counsellor in his local church, a regular attendant at its Sunday service and an inspiration at the weekly prayer-meetings.

The funeral services were conducted at his late residence on Tuesday, Nov. 26. Alanson Wilcox, one of Ohio's veteran preachers, and a friend of fifty years, presided. J. H. Goldner, of Euclid Avenue Church, offered the prayer, Secretary J. J. Cahill, of O. C. M. S., Pres. M. L. Bates, of Hiram College, and Hon. H. R. Cooley made addresses.

"It has been my privilege," says W. F. Rothenburger, "to be his pastor and neighbor for four years, during which time I learned to admire his saintly Christian character, and I shall always deem it one of the richest experiences of my ministry to have known this veteran of the kingdom. Though unable to hear a single word of the sermon in recent years, he attended the services, sat in a most worshipful attitude, and frequently participated in the Lord's Supper. He was as systematic in the King's business as he was in his own, and on the morning of his death said to his son, Mr. A. R. Teachout, 'You will not fail to see that my envelope is placed in the basket this evening.' Within three hours, just at the close of the communion service which he loved, he passed to his greater reward."

Christian Unity in New York

A few evenings ago a meeting was held at the Union League Club in this city in the interests of the University of Nanking, and of the West China Union University, at Chengtu. About 70 gentlemen were present, representing some ten religious bodies. Mr. L. H. Severance, President of the Board of Trustees of the Nanking university, was the host of the evening and presided. A. McLean is vice-president of this board, and J. H. Banton and P. F. Jerome, of the Central Church, New York, are the other Disciple representatives on the board.

The single item of this meeting that I desire to call attention to is the strong note of Christian unity which was sounded. Every speaker said that any hope of advance in the foreign field lay in the co-operation of all Protestant bodies. It was asserted that if foreign missions did nothing more than effect the union of Christendom at home they would be a wise investment. At the close of the meeting the chairman said: "Here we are—ten religious bodies. Now pick them out, if you can by the way they look or by what they say. Are we not all one in Christ?" We stood and with joined hands sang "Blest be the tie that binds." At the right I was joinel to an Episcopalian, at the left to a Presbyterian. We all felt that the occasion was a little foretaste and phophecy of that unity which is rapidly coming to the whole church.

There was another thing that greatly heartened me at this meeting. At last it is being discovered by the other religious bodies that the Disciples of Christ are a force and factor in the religious world. So long as we pursued a policy of exclusiveness, priding ourselves on soundness in the faith, they had for us no word of recognition. But now that we are doing things—doing them in a way that compares most favorably with others—they are quick to recognize it and accord us a just measure of praise. Again and again in this meeting the work of the Disciples was alluded to by speakers of other communions and they did it with a degree of pride and enthusiasm.

When Dr. Macklin's name was mentioned, the body cheered. They knew who he is and to what body he belongs. The phrase "Disciples of Christ" to designate our people comes easily and readily to their lips. How many times in the old days have I gone to such meetings where the work of the church was presented and the Disciples were never mentioned. You would never know that such a people were on the map. I have often gone home sick at heart and wondering to myself why it was. But now, how completely changed is all this! We are coming to our own—coming to occupy our rightful place as one of the great religious communions of the world.

Missionary Opportunities in Dixie Land

Having just completed an itinerary of all our Southern conventions, I cannot refrain from noting some observations. A red blooded American, whose vim and vigor has ever been engaged in eventful contest with opportunity and enterprise in the nascent west, finds himself in congenial environment in "The Great Empire of the New South." One hesitates to give wing to his thoughts lest other sections of continental America, each contending for supremacy, consider him prejudiced, which, of itself, is an evidence of the new life fast regenerating "The Old South." If such there be, let him find consolation in the reflection that opportunity exposed the writer to the "Spirit of the West," now invading the South, and with blood once inoculated with the bacilli, the fever will burn!

In the new South, a traveler must consult his map every morning to make sure he is not in the great and growing West. Stunned by the severe blow of the war between the states impoverished by debt and hindered by most untoward and unequal social, labor and political conditions, this fair and favored section of our beloved country has lagged behind in the rapid pace of material progress. But things are "up and doing" now The position and possibilities of the country south of the old Mason and Dixon line are only beginning to be appreciated.

Owing to the expected crowded condition of Eustis during the coming winter season there is a greater demand for good accommodations than can be secured. At the earnest solicitation of friends Mrs. W. T. Moore has consented to offer six large rooms at The Palms for the accommodation of Christian people. A northern lady, who is an expert caterer, has been secured to take full charge of the comforts of the guests, and enjoyable home living is assured. For particulars address The Palms, Eustis, Florida.

Everybody knows that New York ranks first among the ports of the United States, as measured by the volume of imports and exports passing through it, but not everybody knows that New Orleans ranks second and Galveston third. Of the ten great ports through which eighty-five per cent of our foreign trade passes, four are in the South and two on the Great Lakes. Thirty years ago, seventy-eight per cent of our exports went out of Atlantic ports and fourteen per cent out of the Gulf ports. Last year, Atlantic ports handled only fifty-eight per cent and Gulf ports twenty-two per cent. In the last ten years exports through the Gulf ports increased sixty-four per cent and through Atlantic ports only twenty per cent.

Because of the abundance of her water-power, and "The New South" is fast developing great manufacturing centers. For example, at Augusta, Ga., the waters of the Savannah River are harnessed and sold at the astonishingly low rate of $5.50 per horse power per annum on a basis of a 16-hour day. This is the cheapest known power in the world. The South has numerous rivers, and with the nearness of the cotton fields and timber lands, accounts for the phenomenal strides in manufacturing in the last decade.

Undoubtedly the next great section of the American continent to witness marvelous industrial developments and great advancement of diversified farming, is in the South. Agricultural, manufacturing and banking journals are filled with tidings of this awakening. Millions of dollars are being invested by outside capitalists in the development of the land and the establishment of factories. As a single item to be noted, forty-five millions of good roads are under process of construction. Doubtless the opening of the Panama Canal will have a greater proportionate effect upon the South than any other section of our country. This revival of industrialism is sweeping over the whole section, from Maryland to Texas, and covers almost every line of human activity. The revised advice of Horace Greeley is sane and practical for the American Society as well as for young men, when it says, "Go South, young man, go South."

Superb suburban opportunities present themselves in numerous growing cities, diversified farming, adding attractive inducements to tillers of the soil, already prospered by returns on cotton, tobacco and rice crops, making imperative Christian work in rural communities; the age long and vexed race problem of the South, becomes the more complex as multiplied foreign population makes its advent with the opening of the Panama Canal. The enlargement of its work in the Southland, is imperative to the American Christian Missionary Society, and we entreat our constituency to increased devotion in behalf of making America "God's Country" indeed!

whole of things in negatives, such as the "Unknowable," "Inscrutable," "Infinite," or "Absolute." The latest school of philosophers who prefer to speak of the "life process" and thereby think to escape the personal form, have in fact smuggled in personality in the term "process." It is ultimately meaningless apart from the idea of purposive action which is the characteristic of personality.

There is a reason why many in this age should find it difficult to think of God in terms of personality. The mental life has been so occupied for some time in receiving facts from the external world that it has been unable to organize them with reference to tidy intellectual house-keeping. One is impressed with a sense of the dignity and worth of one's own personality in proportion as he is able to introduce and preserve order and unity in his mental and moral life. One does not desire crystallization and deadness but he does desire orderly movement. So long as things are at sixes and sevens in one's mental and moral constitution one is not much impressed with his own personality as a co-ordinating principle or power for all reality. He is apt to fly to the other extreme and lay hold upon something as impersonal as he can find.

Such has been and is the condition of many modern minds. They have such an overplus of un-co-ordinated materials in their purview; and their outlook upon the external world is so much vaster than their insight into their own spiritual nature, that the sense of personality in them is correspondingly weakened.

This, however, is only a temporary situation. For what, after all, is the vast superstructure that modern science is building, except an achievement of personality. In no realm of human activity today is there finer manifestation of all we mean by personality than the self-conscious, persistent, intelligent purposeful pressing toward the goal of a complete understanding of the facts and forces of the world in scientific endeavor. It can not but be that when personality has achieved the co-ordination and mastery of the facts and relations of the world and human life, it will also find in its own nature the best key to the metaphysical interpretation of reality.

"It must not be forgotten," says James Seth, "that if we are to keep the name of God at all, or any equivalent term, subjectively—an existence of God for himself, analogous to our own personal existence, though doubtless transcending it infinitely in innumerable ways—is an essential element of the conception . . . God may be, must be, infinitely more—we are at least certain that he cannot be less—than we know ourselves to be."

Meantime all those who consider themselves especially religious because they hold to the personal way of conceiving God, will do well to refrain from harshly judging those who are temporarily unable so to think. While we may be very sure that Jesus thought of God as fully and really personal, yet we know of no formal metaphysical definition of personality or of God to which Jesus has bound those who would walk in his way and receive their chief inspiration from him.

We must always in the interests of the vitality and power of the religion of Jesus steadfastly resist the effort to commit it to any particular philosophy either ancient or modern. Jesus spoke the living, pictorial, concrete language of the people and his teaching is far removed from scholastic definition. But his gospel of God was a gospel, and we must keep it such for the heartening and salvation of this toiling, burdened, sinning world.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST

CHICAGO

The Disciples' Deficit to the Federal Council

In the recent meeting of the Federal Council in Chicago, there were a large number of Disciples present and all felt the spirit of fellowship in the great task to which we are committed. But that which most practically proves our fellowship is the extent of our financial contributions to the support of the Federal Council. In 1910 we were apportioned $1,250, and paid it in full; in 1911 we were apportioned $1,364, and paid $724,98; in 1912 we were apportioned $1,309, and up to date we have paid $601.45. There is then a deficit and with that deficit is a reflection upon the whole brotherhood of the Disciples that they are not sincere in their desire for the co-operation of all Christians against the forces of sin. Finis Idleman, Des Moines, Iowa, is the chairman of our committee to raise this fund from our brethren. He has made several appeals and has done well, but we should not let this year close untol every preacher and church official who reads these lines wil see that his church has a definite part in this practical step in Christian union.

It is not a question of our poverty. The churches can send $10, $15, $25, $50, etc., to Mr. Idleman and the Disciples will go on record as proving their sincerity in this great cause. No missionary offering has precedence over this, for it is home missionary work to the core. Let us get together and so line up our interests that this deficit shall no longer appear on the books and in the printed reports of the Federal Council. We have thirty days in which to wipe it out. Shall we do it?

Commission of the Disciples at the Federal Council

Others have given most excellent accounts of the recent meeting of the Chicago Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and perhaps it would be in order to make some reference to the work of our Commission on Christian Union.

The meeting with the Congregationalists included all who were present of both communions and was a very profitable time spent together in a move toward better acquaintance, but the meeting with the Presbyterians and the Christian denominations took up definitely the matters dealing with closer affiliation.

The Christians felt grieved that the Disciples had not been fair to them and in the conference, in which J. H. Garrison, W. F. Richardson, and C. E. Underwood represented the Disciples, the misunderstandings were considerably cleared and Dr. Garrison on the part of the Disciples, and J. P. Barrett on the part of the Christians, were appointed to publish a statement in the journals of both communions in the interests of more cordial relations between the two bodies. The Christians are that part of the movement for Christian union that did not come with Barton W. Stone, when he and most of his associates identified themselves with the Disciples. They are our brethren and we must look out for their interest.

Our meeting with the Presbyterians was full of promise. The Disciples originally came out of the Presbyterians in the line from both Stone and Campbell and so we belong perhaps more to that household than to any other in Christendom. After a conference of some length, dealing in fairness and courtesy with the matters that concerned us, it was decided to have a further conference in Philadelphia the last week in March out of which we hope to be able to make some definite announcement. Dr. McKibbin at the close of the meeting, said that Christian union is in the spirit of the times, so that it cannot be resisted and its approach is inevitable. The Disciples must be alert to every oportunity in the same cause that is so dear to our hearts. These are the days when frankness and courtesy must characterize every movement toward the peace of the church.

Toronto Notes

The Chinese Christian church on Richmond Street, Toronto, is perhaps the only one of its kind among our people. It was organized some years ago by Robert Brown, a laboring mechanic. He has supported it himself, and the property is his own. The offerings have never paid the taxes. He has had no salary for his labor. He himself was a Presbyterian until about three years ago, when he united with the Disciples church, and he has since made his church a part of our brotherhood. He does a good work among the Chinese and has worshippers also in his congregation who are whites. We hope to report this work more fully at another time.

Another item of Home Missionary interest concerns the class of Hollanders being conducted in connection with the Cecil Street church. Our janitor is a Hollander and through his influence a large class is being taught English on Wednesday evenings, and some of them are in the Bible-school Sunday afternoons. The teacher is Prof. J. L. Leary, principal of one of Canada's largest public schools.

The City Mission Board is preparing for the convention, next fall. Our brotherhood will be delighted with Toronto as a convention city, and with Massey Hall, one of the best known convention halls on the continent. The hospitality of the city will probably not be much boasted, but it will be quite evident and sincere.

The Cecil Street church Bible-school observed Home Missions, Sunday, Nov. 24, in connection with the A. C. M. S. offering. The society is undertaking some work among the Canadian schools which we are glad to see. Our offering will be about $15.000.

The St. Clarens Ave. church, R. W. Stevenson, pastor, is planning for a meeting in the near future, to be led by B. H. Hayden of London, Ont. We have not learned of any plans for meetings at Koole Street or Wynchwood. Cecil Street will probably have John E. Pounds, of Hiram, O., for a meeting in January-February.

Medical Missionary Conference

The fifth annual Medical Missionary conference is to be held at the Sanitarium in Battle Creek, Michigan, December 31 to January 3, inclusive. All the missionaries are to be guests of Dr. J. H. Kellogg and the Sanitarium management during the week. Some are already at the institution and the conference promises to be the greatest ever held both in point of attendance and in the program presented. It is interdenominational and some of the oldest and most prominent missionaries in the world will be present.

Bishop W. F. Oldham, for years in India but now serving as secretary of the M. E. Foreign Mission Board, is to preside. Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell, for over fifty years a worker in Africa, Bishop James N. Thoburn from India, and Bishop W. S. Lewis, who goes soon to China, will be present, also.

Ellen M. Stone will tell of "The Little Giants of the Balkan." Dr. Duncan Bulkly will speak of "Medical Work in Siam." "Opening of Hunan Province with the Medical Gospel" is the topic to be handled by Dr. Frank A. Keller. Joseph Cohen, field secretary of the Westminster Mission of the Jews, will talk on "The Jew First." Dr. Harry L. Canright, who built a hospital in western China; Dr. Ira Harris, for over 25 years in Syria; Dr. Charles C. Selden, superintendent of the Kerr Leper Refuge, in Canton, China; Dr. Joseph K. Green, for 50 years in andabout Constantinople; Dr. Royal J. Dye, of the Congo; Dr. C. C. Cornwel of Mexico; Dr. J. C. Field, of Bolivia, are to be on the program, as are Dr. Claude W. Freeman, Dr. Frank A. Keller and Rev. Isaac T. Headland, D. D., all of China, and Dr. Robert H. H. Goheen and Dr. L. B. Wolfe, both of India.

Lucy Ryder Myers of the Chicago Training School for Missionaries, will give a talk, and other women speakers will be Ida M. Scott, Harriett E. Parker and Bertha G. Johns.

Two topics of interest are "The Medical Missionary as an Advocate of Physical Reform," by Dr. D R. Kress, and "Inexpensive Centers for Medical Mission Work in Large Cities," by Dr. David B. Paulson, Rev. J. C. Floyd, D. D., executive secretary of the M. E. Financial Commission, is to be among the speakers.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

We were in error a few weeks ago in saying that Mr. Metcalf of Girard, paid all the expenses of their minister to the Louisville convention. It was the Girard church that sent their minister and paid his expenses. We beg pardon for the mistake.

When a minister leaves a field he should take pains to leave an up-to-date corrected list of the members and their addresses, with other useful data, for his successor. Every pastor can readily see what a great help that would be in going into a new field. This would be a good New Year's resolution for the preachers.

Another fine resolution: "As soon as I change my address or change any of my preaching points, I will at once notify the office of the State Missionary Society; and as soon as I go into another state I will notify the secretary of the state I am leaving, also the secretary of the state in which I locate."

Preachers make a serious mistake in slipping around from place to place and from state without keeping in close touhc with their state office. It is not a good sign.

Has your November offering been taken. Has it been sent in? Who is holding it? Look into the matter and be sure that it has actually been mailed to the treasurer. Sometimes they get sidetracked for a month or two.

A Summer Home in Winter

Owing to the expected crowded condition of Eustis during the coming winter season there is a greater demand for good accommodations than can be secured. At the earnest solicitation of friends Mrs. W. T. Moore has consented to offer six large rooms at The Palms for the accommodation of Christian people. A northern lady, who is an expert caterer, has been secured to take full charge of the comforts of the guests, and enjoyable home living is assured. For particulars address The Palms, Eustis, Florida.

A Neglected and Unpopular Art

WHEN IT IS CONSIDERED HOW LITTLE attention Disciples have given to the fine art of preserving the best things that have been said and done among us, in forms which should win the admiration of posterity, we ought not to be surprised that bookmaking is yet in its rudimentary stages among us and that our journalism is still in the stage of becoming. There has been the "lucky curve" here to help us as well as in some other departments of our history. Many of the writers we have—and there are a few who cannot be surpassed by the best in any Christian communion—have stumbled upon their gift, waking up one fine morning to discover that if they were not famous, they had within themselves the foundations of fame. But there are others who write frequently with the genius of a schoolboy; while others, who write with vigor, waste their excellent efforts by confining their output to the defense or to the propagation of ideas which the world has been forgetting for twenty years, if not for two hundred years. The men who have ideas and know how to express them, who have learned how to distinguish between the true and the vital, the permanent and the transient, must always mould the thought of a people.

"Books," says William De Bury of the fourteenth century, "are the masters that instruct us without rods or ferules, without hard words and anger, without clothes and money. If you approach them, they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you."

As compared with a book a journal is a temporary repository for the things that endure, but we must advance from the journal to the making of books, knowing that whatever is worth preserving in transient is likely to be preserved in permanent forms. And to that end every preacher in the Kingdom should become a scribe.

Writing may be a gift, but it is also an accomplishment that can be cultivated. It is a misfortune that all young preachers are not required to write out in full many of their sermons before delivery; and if the memory is not equal to the task of reproducing them verbatim, congregations should be trained to look with favor upon the use of the manuscript. But some congregations and even preachers look upon a manuscript in the hands of a speaker with about the same degree of tolerance as they would look upon him if he had a cloven foot. This is the result of high-pressure doctrine that if one "speaks right out" the product is doctrine that if one "speaks right out" the product is his own; if he reads a sermon it is almost certain that he stole it!

A minister writing recently in criticism of the use of manuscript by a few speakers at the Louisville convention—tell it not in Gath!—actually confessed that when he saw a preacher with a manuscript he was tempted to leave the building, or forget what was in progress by seeking oblivion in the columns of the daily paper. Such men ought to have lived before the days of printing, or even of writing for that matter, and the circle of their joys would have been complete.

What better evidence of a barren ministry intellectually can be found than where the absence of a manuscript is a beatitude! Happy the men whose memories are sufficiently trained to reproduce the contents of their minds, but for most men the manuscripts will sometimes be in evidence, and ought to be, as the finished product of the best they can give to their people. Of many inexcusable follies none surpasses this prejudice against the use of the manuscript. We mention this as only a symptom of the disease which has prevented many ministers from setting their thoughts down in permanent form for their own profit.

Those who have cultivated the friendship of the pen can bear witness that no friendship is more delightful. We plead for a greater facility among our men in the use of the pen, that we may come into the era when we shall conscientiously hand down to posterity some other treasures in book form worthy to be classed with such a work, for instance, as James S. Lamar's "First Principles and Perfection."

But the cultivation of friendship for the pen is not only greatly to be desired for its own sake, it also trains one to appreciate the treasures of our English literature. New fields of investigation will continually open before him. If the pen does not always presuppose the student, time will make the pen a necessity for the student. In a few years he will find himself as helpless in his field without his pen as the soldier on the battlefield without his sword. I venture to say that every famous orator, every famous preacher, became so because of his love of writing, even though in the beginning writing was an almost hopeless attempt. Think of the volumes which came from the pen of Spurgeon, Beecher, McLaren, Phillips Brooks, and even Dr. Talmage, all of them pulpit orators. In addition to their books, they wrote much for the journals of their respective churches, Beecher and Talmage at one period of their lives being editors, while Spurgeon's connection with the Sword and Trowel is as well known as his ministry in the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

I would say to every young preacher, write much, cultivate the art; if necessary, do as Robert Louis Stevenson did: write barrels of manuscript and destroy it, profiting by the joy of writing. The pen has introduced many a man to fame, and even to immortality.

Dollar Diplomacy

President Taft has again resorted to the instalment plan in sending his fourth annual message to congress, which has just begun its sixty-second session. It has to do entirely with foreign relations of the United States, and strongly defends the policy of the present administration of "substituting dollars for bullets," a policy which has met with some opposition even within the Republican party itself. The great increase in our export trade is pointed out as a vindication of "dollar diplomacy." There is one significant omission and that is with reference to the termination of the Russian treaty of commerce and navigation and to the nature of future negotiations. So long as Russia holds to her present internal policy regarding American citizens of Jewish birth, a most delicate diplomatic situation obtains. Perhaps the only thing to be done now is to bequeath this vexing problem to the next administration, but this nation cannot turn aside from facing this question too long. As the message itself says, "We are now in a larger relation with broader rights of our own and obligations to others than ourselves." If we are ever to fulfil these obligations to others than ourselves, we must first secure broader rights for our own citizens of Jewish birth. But to secure these broader rights for Jewish citizens, whenever they wish to travel in Russia, means interference with deep-seated racial customs and internal community laws of another nation—and when that other nation is Russia it will be difficult for the United States to interfere.

Houris or Furies?

When Kipling wrote his famous line about the female of the species being deadlier than the male, we thought it was just a bit overdrawn, to put it mildly. Recent events may compel a reversal of former judgment, and a recognition that this statement was prophetic. It will not long be in fashion to speak of the terrors of death, for most of them will have been transferred to the life that now is—at least, so far as England is concerned. We had become accustomed to the hair-pulling, screaming, Amazonian assaults perpetrated by de-natured women upon English public men, but the most recent news from the mother country is truly alarming! A while ago it was a plate-glass smashing carnival (looking-glasses, we believe, were not interfered with, though just why suffragettes of this particular type should need them is difficult to understand). Last week it was throwing acid into the mail boxes —although this retort was not nearly so tart as those they had been giving with the aid of what James calls "the unruly member." And now, according to the most recent press reports, it is bombs! In marked contrast to these misnamed militant practices, is the dignified, and altogether worthy feminist movement in the United States, which at the recent election won in five of the states, and thereby has secured the respectful regard of most of its former opponents. The effort to enfranchise women in England must inevitably receive a permanent set-back as a result of these latest achievements in anarchy. A group of houris might get the ballot at once, but a band of furies, never!

Unscrambling the Harriman Railway Systems

One of the most far-reaching decisions ever handed down by the United States Supreme Court is its recent mandate to the Union Pacific Railway to divest itself of the stock it owns in the Southern Pacific. This marks the end of Harriman's dream which contemplated the gathering under one head of all existing transcontinental lines and the exclusion of all competition. If the vast schemes of this railroad wizard had been found to be within the law, there would have been no remedy for unjust and excessive rates, restrained as they are only by competition. This decision not only restores the advantages of competition, but it also means that the present interstate commerce laws are adequate to deal with the situation. "It may be regarded as settled that a combination which places railroads engaged in interstate commerce in such relation as to create a single dominating control in one corporation, whereby natural and existing competition in interstate commerce is unduly restricted or suppressed, is within the condemnation of the act." According to the best legal opinion, the principles of this decision regarding the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific merger will apply in the case of many other well-known roads, notably the New York Central, which controls the Michigan Central and the Lake Shore, two presumably rival roads between Chicago and Buffalo, and also the West Shore, paralleling the original road between Buffalo and New York City, and which, together with the New York, New Haven and Hartford, controls the Boston and Albany. As a result of this application of the Sherman anti-trust law, it will hereafter be impossible for great railroad systems to combine competing lines, although they may control connecting roads, as is shown by the authorization given by the court to the Union Pacific to retain possession of the Central Pacific, thereby enabling the former to run from the Missouri River to the Pacific Coast. How long will it take before the effect of this decision will reach the individual shipper and traveler, if at all? Will this attempt to "unscramble" the Harriman railway omelette prove to be another instance in which the corporations still control the eggs while the people have the broken shells?

Socialism and the Churches

William, Cardinal O'Connell, in his recent pastoral, says that "the principles of socialism are utterly opposed to the principles of Christianity." In our judgment, his eminence is totally in error. "Socialism" means, to be sure, very different things to different men. We are aware that some, and perhaps many socialists—though we think not the majority—are opposed to the principles of Christianity. But we are equally aware that some church members, with a splendid reputation for orthodoxy, do not practice all these principles, and we suspect it is more correct to say that it is the failure of Christian people to carry out the principles of Christianity rather than the principles themselves which socialism opposes. We venture to assert that there is no body of people outside avowed socialists themselves that has a profounder interest in the recent social awakening than the rank and file of the Protestant churches of America.

—The resignation of Japan's ministry seems to have turned upon a disagreement between the Prime Minister and the War Minister over an increase of the army. Premier Saionji appears to have been more warlike, or war-expectant, than the responsible minister of war.

Protestantism's Social Objective

THE PROGRAM ADOPTED BY THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA:

The churches must stand:

For equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life.

For the protection of the family by the single standard of purity, uniform divorce laws, proper regulation of marriage and proper housing.

For the fullest possible development for every child, especially by the provision of proper education and recreation.

For the abolition of child labor.

For such regulation of the conditions of toil for women as shall safeguard the physical and moral health of the community.

For the abatement and prevention of poverty.

For the protection of the individual and society from the social, economic and moral waste of the liquor traffic.

For the conservation of health.

For the protection of the worker from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases and mortality.

For the right of all men to the opportunity for self-maintenance, for safeguarding this right against encroachments of every kind, and for the protection of workers from the hardships of enforced unemployment.

For suitable provision for the old age of the workers and for those incapacitated by injury.

For the principle of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes.

For the gradual and reasonable reduction of the hours of labor to the lowest practicable point, and for that degree of leisure for all which is a condition of the highest human life.

For a living wage as a minimum in every industry and for the highest wage that each industry can afford.

For the most equitable division of the product of industry that can ultimately be devised.

Future Recognition

"No experience is too trivial," says Professor Peabody, "no happiness is too perfect, no tragedy too devasting, to be ennobled and illuminated by Christian insight and serenity. The field of religious leadership is the whole life. And death, the apostle proceeds, is yours; its perennial enigma, its baffling mystery, its desolating solitude—all this, even if not interpretable, becomes enduring and chastening as it is held in the greater mystery and encompassing peace of the Christian thought of God. 'Oh death, where is thy sting! Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord, Jesus Christ!'"

Belief in the "life everlasting" has been one of the important items in the creed of the church from its beginning. The belief has been expressed in terms of the culture of each age of the church. Racial feeling, national rivalries, theological disputes, and personal animosities have had much to do with the descriptions of the life that lies beyond death, especially of the region to which those who please not God are to be assigned.

Belief in future recognition should cause us to be watchful and guarded in our conduct. It is not pleasant to meet here one whom we have wronged. Will it be different in the next world? Will matters of right and wrong be indifferent there? We may confidently expect a larger interpretation of actions when we meet each other face to face and know as we have never before known. Due allowance will then be made for ignorance and lack of opportunity. If we have faults in heaven, we shall not be bothered with that chief nuisance of earth, the man or the woman who never meets a friend or acquaintance without reminding him of some error in doctrine or some evil in action.

We have been taught to confess our belief in the communion of saints. From this communion we learn what is the meaning of recognition. We merge our interests with those of all men and thus make ourselves worthy of a place in the eternal city. We are not seeking, when we have communion with the saints, a purely personal salvation; we are seeking to save the world. In the words of Professor Peabody: "The Christian life is not a way of retreat, but a way of victory. The Christian character is not a monastic runaway goodness, but an aggressive, conquering goodness. Lawrence Oliphant once said, that the type of man which England most needed was a spiritually-minded man of the world, a man, that is to say, who can be in the world and understand it, but maintain among the affairs of the world a spiritual mind. What Oliphant said of England in the nineteenth century is precisely what Paul said of Corinth in the first. That bustling world of commerce and trade, that mingled mass of power and sin, made to his mind good material for the work of a spiritually-minded man of the world. 'It is all yours,' he says, not to condemn, but to interpret and redeem. The aim of a Christian is not to save himself out of a wretched world, like a rat running from a sinking ship, but to bring the world itself, like a battered but still seaworthy vessel, with all its precious cargo of tasks and hopes, safe to port."

The Christian hope is for present use. If it takes a man away from the present task, it is a false hope. We are bound, as disciples of the Lord, to relieve present misery. We must seek to understand men here and now. A heaven in the company of men who ignore or despise us in this world is not a pleasant prospect. If we expect to know more fully in the future life, we ought to be diligent in acquiring knowledge here. If we believe that greatness is not measured by place but by service, we ought to be cultivating the insight that enables us to discover the great ones of the kingdom of God who perform lowly tasks. Many of us now have to wait until a man is elected to high office before we can recognize his ability. We judge of another's knowledge by the countries in which he has traveled and the college degree attached to his name more than by what he actually knows. Future recognition will be of a different sort. We shall not ask about the road one has followed, but about qualities of mind and heart, about courage, faith, love, and insight. The ancestry and environment will be of interest only as they help to an understanding of the character. Sham aristocracies of birth, wealth, and knowledge will yield to the aristocracy of moral worth and spiritual insight. [Midweek Service, Dec. 25. Matt. 22:23-33; 17:1-8.] S. J.

Reading for Children

In our grandmothers' day the problem of reading for the children was difficult because children's books were few; now it is difficult because they are many.

Almost all children like to read; and as with the eager enthusiasm of youth they reach out for books, it behooves the grown-ups who watch over them to see that the best fall into their hands. This selection of the best requires not only keen judgment in deciding what books are in general desirable, but in determining what book is needed by a particular child at a certain time. One must know his child, in other words, as well as his book. For books are not merely for amusement. Great as is their province in affording never-failing diversion, they have a greater—the province of molding character. Thus they offer to the home and the school the most potent help in teaching and inspiring.

The great story-tellers of the world have ever been the great teachers; and even a slight story often conveys a truth better than any other means. Could any amount of precept demonstrate the foolishness of pride so well as the story of the "Gilded Weather-Vane?" The weather-vane on the tip, tip, top of the church spire saw the people of the hamlet daily looking up at it to see how the wind blew. It grew rather vain and thought itself beautiful and exceedingly important. Finally the little weather-vane decided it would no longer obey the winds as they blew, and it stiffened itself in its pride. That very night a strong gale came down from the north and blew against the weather-vane and tried to turn it, but the little gilded thing stiffened itself still more and refused to turn. At last it was broken and fell to the ground and next morning when the fisher folk of the hamlet came out to look they found no vane on the spire. Then they looked at the leaves of the trees, and finding by them that the wind was favorable they started off gaily with many shouts to launch their boats and sail away. But the little weather-vane was left alone in the church-yard. Miss Elizabeth Harrison, who relates the story, not wishing the children to think the case quite hopeless, tells us that the sexton found the poor little thing and mended it and replaced it on the tip top of the spire where it gladly stayed and turned obediently to show the fishermen how the wind blew.

A few weeks since there appeared in the daily press the incident of a youth, brought up abroad, whose patriotism was fired, whose character was changed by a story—the story of "A Man Without a Country." Even the tiny child listening to her first story cannot miss the point as to the dangers encountered by disobedience as she follows the adventures of "Peter Rabbit." Because children so love stories the modern writers for childhood have turned almost everything into vivid story-form: geography, natural history, science and history; and the child's capacity to absorb these things when properly presented is marvelous, well-nigh limitless. A series of books such as "Peeps At Many Lands," with its attractive colored plates, will give to a child an intimacy with the life and customs of a country far greater than many a well-read adult obtains from his dryer books. Miss Tappan's histories are another illustration of effective story-telling. To catch the spirit of a country, to depict its struggles and its achievements and make it as personal as the tale of a hero—this is a great gift, and this is the method by which history becomes a living thing to a child. The interesting facts of natural history and of science become vivid also when they are the story of "Mr. Badger and the Three Little Moles," or of the "Fairy Ice-Crystals."

Children are usually fond of poetry when it is read to them. It is more difficult than prose and they need help with an occasional word and with the rhythm; but once they have learned to appreciate them, children love poems. They never tire of poems which tell type and it is a pity for them ever to associate a great book with a story; passages of "Hiawatha," "The Arab's Farewell to His Steed," "The Mouse-Tower on the Rhine," "How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix," and the old stand-bys such as "'Twas the Night Before Christmas," "The Blackberry Girl," "Paul Revere," and "Sheridan's Ride."

They do not enjoy these poems merely for the story, but for the rhythm and lilt of the lines. For this reason children ordinarily like some of the Psalms, "because they sound so good," as one child said. They like poems which paint a beautiful picture such as the "Coral Grove":

> "Deep in the wave is a coral grove
> Where the purple mullet and gold-fish rove.
> Where the sea-flower spreads its leaves of blue
> Which never are wet with falling dew,
> But in bright and changeful beauty shine
> Far down in the green and glassy brine."

or Wordsworth's "Daffodils" or a part of Lowell's "The First Snow Fall:"

> "The snow had begun in the gloaming
> And busily all the night
> Had been heaping field and highway
> With a silence deep and white.
> Every pine and fir and hemlock
> Wore ermine too dear for an earl,
> And the poorest twig on the elm-tree
> Was ridged inch-deep with pearl."

One reason why children enjoy such poems is because they can verify the pictures. In the same way they dearly love the poems of Stevenson which express their own experience, or a poem like the "Hush-a-bye Lady" from "Rock-a-bye Town." Read them nonsense poems and humorous poems, as well, and see how they take to them—read them, for instance, "The Lost Heir."

As far as it is possible give children well-printed books with large type, and good bindings. They do not enjoy books in fine a cheap binding. Even if our means are limited let us try to give the children books to own that they may know the joy of possession and be able to reread their favorites time after time.

The ideal library for a child will ever be made up largely of stories—unadulterated stories—stories which stir the imagination and sweeten the spirit. There is a wealth of modern literature to choose from, conspicuous in which are such books as Kipling's "Jungle Books," "Hans Brinker," "The Iron Star," "The Hollow Tree Book," and "Peter Pan."

We must not grow bewildered, however, and forget the greatest stories of the world. We defraud a child if we withhold from him the best, and we should remember that the noble tales of by-gone ages have lost none of their ancient power to fascinate the mind and kindle the spirit.

What can better stimulate the spirit of chivalry or of devotion to a great cause than the old Greek hero-stories, retold by Kingsley, of Theseus and the others; or the tales of St. George and the dragon, and of St. Christopher? What could ever give more unadulterated joy to a boy than the tale of Robin Hood so captivatingly retold by Howard Pyle? These are stories which the children read and reread, which they act out and really live. One of the most perfect stories ever written for children is Hawthorne's version of the story of Bellerophon and the winged horse. Then there are the stories of the Rhine-maidens, Siegfried and the other German operas; there are stirring tales from the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey"; and there are the stories from Shakespeare and from the Bible.

Many mothers and teachers have discovered that they do not need to use simplified renderings of the great masterpieces; that merely by explaining a line or cutting a passage, children love to listen to Shakespeare's plays, such as "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Tempest," and "The Merchant of Venice." They will enjoy many scenes from other plays if the plots are told to them, and they will like nothing better than to act them out in their play. Finally, we come to the stories of the Bible—incomparable in almost every way. No stories are more vivid and compelling, none furnish the child's mind with so much of literary background, none have such power to influence character. Some small children like these stories in simple modern English, others love the quaint phraseology of the King James' Version. In any case, whatever the story or poem, the child's enjoyment will be increased a hundredfold if it is read aloud by some one who can put life and illumination into the reading. The children who are fortunate enough to know a daily hour in front of the open fire beside their mother, if she be such a reader, are the children to whom the world of books is as a wonder region where, once having passed the golden gates and entered in, they may forever wander, with minds refreshed and illumined, with imaginations kindled and with spirits sweetened and ennobled by the great books of all the ages.

And Now Just What Is Baptism Itself?

In answer to an inquirer who makes an erroneous quotation from The Christian Century on the subject of baptism, The Christian Evangelist belittles this newspaper and the constituency that holds in general with it and assumes to set forth a definition of baptism with which it says the opinion of the Disciples is in accord. As a preface to its definition it quotes approvingly its correspondent's statement that "baptism is essentially immersion," and then says: "Baptism has faith in Christ for its antecedent, immersion in water as its form and assurance of forgiveness and membership in Christ's body as its consequent."

From the very humble position in which our authoritative contemporary placed us, we beg modestly to suggest that there is not one Disciple of average intelligence in the land who would affirm that baptism is essentially immersion, and also that its form is immersion. Alexander Campbell taught his followers too well the distinction between these two statements for any of them to be caught trying to affirm them both. The great master of the immersion dogma affirmed the former and explicitly denied the latter. Immersion is not a "form" or "mode" of baptism, he said, it is the act itself; immersion is baptism.

Contrary to Mr. Campbell, The Christian Century declares that immersion is not baptism but is the proper mode or form of administering baptism. Our St. Louis contemporary has performed the remarkable feat of reconciling Alexander Campbell and The Christian Century on the baptism question! And it entertains in its capacious intelligence our two views which both he and we regard as contradictory and mutually exclusive. Certainly all doubt as to the "representative" character of the Christian Evangelist must now vanish!

But suppose we pass by our contemporary's approval of its correspondent's statement and confine our attention to its own deliberate definition.

This definition gives the antecedent of baptism. But obviously the antecedent of a thing is not the thing itself.

It also gives the consequent of baptism. But obviously the consequent of a thing is not the thing itself.

It also gives the form of baptism. But obviously the form of a thing is not the thing itself.

Here then we have a definition of a thing with the thing itself left out!

Will the Christian Evangelist from its authoritative eminence tell its inquirer and its readers what baptism itself is? We venture to predict that if it will do so, consistently with what it has here said baptism is not, it will find itself standing on the precise ground occupied by The Christian Century!

No Monopoly in the Kingdom of God

There is one group of churchmen whom The Christian Century candidly confesses it fears to converse with. Some two years ago our guileless pen was drawn into making a courteous explanation of the Disciples' reason for mentioning the name of James O'Kelly together with Thomas Campbell and others among the fathers and "patron saints," so to speak, of the Disciples' movement for Christian unity. Our statement was called forth by a sharp challenge in the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the organ of the "Christian denomination," sometimes known as the Christian Connection.

How sharp the challenge was and what a fund of suppressed animus had accumulated back of it, our editorial soul did not suspect. Suffice it to say that our response touches off a huge explosion in the camp of our fellow churchmen. The articles that appeared and the correspondence bristled and burned.

In order to avoid consuming space in the newspapers to no purpose a personal letter was written to the editor of the Herald asking for certain points of information. The reply came bristling with such absurd and gratuitous implications that what information it contained was rendered unusable by the childish temper it also displayed. A communication from Dr. Barrett, the editor, was finally published and The Christian Century withdrew its hands from the bristles as composedly as it could. Imagine our surprise when, some time afterward, a booklet dealing with the doctrines and history of the "Christian denomination" fell into our hands in an appendix to which we found our personal letter of inquiry appearing, together with Dr. Barrett's reply!

We now note that the Christian Standard has allowed itself to be taunted into knocking the chip off the Herald's shoulder. Several copies of the latter paper containing replies to the Standard are before us, stamped by the editor: "Your attention, please."

Candidly, we are afraid to give it any attention! Not because we wish to evade any facts—we wish to know the facts, nor because we wish to keep the facts from the Disciple public—even if the Herald's statement of the history is correct it is not vital nor even important to the Disciples. But we fear to discuss any set of facts with Christian churchmen who are capable of taking umbrage at the things which these brethren so passionately resent.

What are those things in which it is alleged that the Disciples offend their "Christian" neighbors? They are two:

1. In tracing a certain historical connection, through Barton W. Stone and his fellow Christians, with James O'Kelly, the founder of the "Christian denomination," and, on account of his teaching and practice with respect to Chistian unity, embracing O'Kelly in our affection as a leader sent of God into the fruits of whose labors we Disciples have gratefully entered.

2. In using the name Christian as describing our churches when they, the "Christian denomination," had already made the title their exclusive possession by right of prior appropriation.

It perplexes us that humble Christian men, sure of their ground, could have any feeling at all save a feeling of profound rejoicing that others held their founder in the same veneration as they hold him, and that there are a million and a quarter of followers of Christ, besides their own body, that refuse to wear any name save the name that honors their Lord.

It is not to the present point to inquire into the facts lying back of the sentiment the Disciples entertain for James O'Kelly. Let it be assumed that the Disciples have misread history, that they are under a delusion as to the historical relation of the Stone "Christians" and the Campbell "Disciples." One would suppose that the Herald would be irresistibly tempted to encourage the historical delusion, inasmuch as it brings the Disciples into vital relation not only with their great founder but with the "Christian denomination." Why is the Herald so determined to disillusionize us? We Disciples wish to get as close to all our Christian brethren as we can, and if we can find the slenderest filament of historical connection with any Christian body it is our natural impulse to work it for all it is worth as an aid to the richest and widest fraternity.

Were the positions reversed, the Disciples would take pride in knowing that their brethren of the "Christian denomination" held Thomas Campbell in veneration and named him in the catalogue of their heroes and fathers even though the historical connection were obscure or doubtful. It is the essence of the sectarian spirit to assume that one's party has a monopoly of Christian leaders. "I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas," said they at Corinth. But Paul said that was sectarianism. "All are yours," he declared. "We are of Wesley," say the Methodists, "We are of Calvin," say the Presbyterians, "We are of O'Kelly," say the "Christians." But we Disciples will not allow any group of churchmen to possess a monopoly on any servant of God. They are all ours. Wesley is ours. Calvin is ours. O'Kelly is ours. And whatever the historical facts may prove to be, the spiritual affinity can not be destroyed.

But the height of this sectarian arrogance and pique is disclosed in the Herald's objection to anybody else except the "Christian denomination" using the name Christian as the title of the church. Who gave these brethren the right to denominationalize the name Christian? The unsectarian attitude of the Disciples with respect to the name is brought out here in sharp contrast to the attitude of the so-called "Christian denomination." We Disciples rejoice when any church or body of Christian people flings away divisive human names and calls itself by the catholic name of Christian. Instead of resenting it in childish pique we plead with all Christ's followers to be known by the divine name only. And if interdenominational confusion results, we praise God for the confusion!

The Christian Century holds many things in common with its brethren of the "Christian denomination." It could hardly be otherwise considering the close relations obtaining between them and the Disciples in Stone's and Campbell's day. There are some differences between us, as, for instance, the theory and practice of Christian baptism. On that subject The Christian Century finds little affinity with the Christian denomination. And there are, perhaps, some theological differences, but these are increasingly negligible.

But a vital and fundamental difference which, before there can be unity, must be resolved either by an explanation or a change of sentiment is this un-Christian, un-catholic spirit in which our brethren of the "Christian denomination" seem to us to assume that they have a patent on some things to which every child of God has an indefeasible right.

Gipsy Smith Becomes a Free Agent

While other famous evangelists have been making evangelism objectionable because of their commercialism and immense financial returns, the modest compensation of Gipsy Smith, $3,000 a year, will be a surprise to many who believe that his services are worth much more than that. No one ever classed "Gipsy" with the grafters. There are still a few who have not bowed the knee to Baal! The following from the Continent will be of interest to all who have followed this magnetic evangelist's remarkable career:

In recent visits of Gipsy Smith, the famous English evangelist, to America it was somewhat annoying to American committees in charge of his meetings to find that he was not a free man Under an arrangement made several years ago he had contracted his services as an evangelistic preacher to the National Free Church Council of England, and could accept invitations to America or other countries only on consent of this organization

The Gipsy's contract bound him not to accept anywhere any compensation beyond the yearly salary paid him by the council, which has been understood to be $3,000. In a certain way this stipulation worked to the evangelist's advantage, because it saved him from any suspicion of avarice in connection with his ministry. But the council which employed him has not been equally free from criticism. It seemed to treat Gipsy Smith very frankly as a money-making asset. It demanded, in consideration of resigning him to America for a period, a heavy share of collections taken at his meetings, a stipulation which, it is believed, did not fail in any instance to net the council a considerable surplus over the Gipsy's salary. To be sure, this profit on the transaction was undoubtedly applied to Christian work in England, but the United States is not accustomed to regard England as a country needing missionary contributions.

There is therefore promise for a much more satisfactory employment of Gipsy Smith's great soul-winning talent on this side the Atlantic in the late announcement from London that his relation to the Free Church Council has been canceled. The reason for the change is candidly said to lie in the feeling that his usefulness was limited by his contract, and it is better therefore to leave him free to work wherever he may be called in other lands or in his own. No doubt under these conditions he may soon be expected to revisit America. It is stated, however, that he has promised to lead in five great Free Church "missions" in his own nation in the year 1914—thus exhibiting that there is no breach between the evangelist and his former employers.

—The Christian Evangelist in defining baptism says that one of its "consequents" is membership in Christ's body or Church. This is a significant and useful statement, especially when taken in connection with the same paper's radical admission in the preceding clause that immersion is the "form" of baptism. This view of immersion as "form" and baptism as essence or substance leaves room for the conviction our contemporary is known to hold, namely, that Presbyterians and other evangelical Christians who have not been immersed are, nevertheless, members of the Church of Christ. Probably our neighbor's logic would run somewhat after this fashion:

Unimmersed Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ.

But membership in the Church of Christ is a consequent of baptism.

Therefore unimmersed Presbyterians must have been baptized.

But they were not baptized by the "form" of immersion.

Therefore they must have been baptized by some other "form."

Therefore the immersion dogma is pure fiction.

The Christian Century is unable to find any flaw in our contemporary's logic here—if it will forgive us for dragging to the light certain of its mental processes about which it seems to be somewhat shy. But lest we may have overlooked some fallacy we submit the matter to our own readers for their opinion.

—That splendid weekly the Churchman, in many ways a model religious newspaper, with its fine mechanical make-up, always delighting the eye and the hand, and covering the activities of the Episcopal church at home and abroad as well as many of the phases of social service, has recently called to the position of editor-in-chief Rev. Herbert Briton Gwyn, of Chicago, for the past ten years rector of St. Simeon's Church in this city. Mr. Gwyn is a Canadian and a graduate of Trinity College, Toronto. The Churchman was purchased last spring by a syndicate represented by some of the ablest of the Episcopal clergy of New York City. Mr. W. B. Parker, formerly associated with the Atlantic Monthly, will continue to act as business manager.

We need not be afraid that we shall go too far in serving others. There is no danger that any of us will ever go too far in the walk of active love. There is no likelihood that any of us will become too bountiful, too kind, too helpful to his neighbor.—J. C. Hare.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly.

A Sunday in Tokio

It might well be said that Tokio is the Chicago of Japan. Yokohama as the port city facing the outer world is the New York, Kyoto the Boston, but Tokio is the Chicago of the land. It has the same hustling spirit, the same combination of commercial and educational interests, and much the same flat landscape. In it there is the Imperial Palace, which is also a fortress, one of the imperial universities, many smaller college and high school institutions, and the many varieties of native religious foundations, both Shinto and Buddhist.

It is a combination of the medieval and the modern, with some streets that look almost as up-to-date as any in America, with public buildings and business houses that would do credit to any city, and street cars of the most approved sort clanging through the crowd of jinrikishas and pedestrians that nearly fill the space from side to side. Then there are other streets, in the more native and ancient section of the place where not a vistage of the modern world can be found. There the little shops face each other across the thoroughfare at a distance of only ten or twelve feet, and it would be difficult for two 'rikishas to pass.

And everywhere crowds of people, hurrying along, dressed in all the varieties of the rather attractive Japanese garments, and most of them, men, women and children carrying babies on their backs. It is a never-ceasing astonishment to a stranger here to see the immense number of children. There is certainly no danger of race suicide at present in Japan. The women carry their babies on their backs inside of the rather large outer garment that can be slipped back to form a sort of carrying bag for the infant. An astonishing number of men also seem to have the care of little children. They carry them on their backs or in their arms, and appear to have as much concern for them as do the women.

But the thing that most of all attracts the interest of the visitor is the care of babies by children so young as to seem only a few months past the infant stage themselves. Literally thousands of children are to be seen on the streets of any Japanese city with babies fastened on their backs. They run errands, work at household tasks and even play games with the ubiquitous baby evermore on their little backs. It is a surprise that any Japanese child should grow up straight with such burdens. Of course one soon learns that the children of the better classes do not share so much of this hard work, but the outward apearance of things would impress one with the idea that all alike are burden bearers of the infantile sort.

As for the babies themselves, they apparently have the best time in the world. It was some days before we heard one of them cry. And wether the parental brother or sister pays any attention to them or not, they are serene and contented all the same. It is not an unusual thing to see a baby blinking in the vain effort to escape from the glare of the sun in its eyes, or dropping off to sleep with its little head hanging over to the side or straight back in a manner to predict a broken neck or back. And all the time the older child is busy at work or play without concern for the youngster. But that is the fashion of the place, and somehow they all seem to grow up into a fair degree of strength.

But I started in another direction in this letter, and was diverted for the moment by the crowd of children on the street. For though it is Sunday, there is no special attention paid to the day. To be sure the banks and some of the large business houses close on Sundays. This is not due to any Christian sentiment, but to the wish of the Japanese to follow as nearly as possible the customs of the western nations whose good will they are cultivating. The native custom is to rest about two days in the month. But as each trade or individual chooses the days to be observed, there is no uniformity, and outside of the great national holidays the partial observance of Sunday is all that prevails.

On our first Sunday in Japan it was arranged that a union service of all the churches of the Disciples should be held at the Koishikawa Church, where Rev. P. A. Davey is the missionary, and Pastor Hasagawa is in charge of the congregation. It must be understood that in all the churches, both of the Disciples and the other Christian forces of Japan, the missionary does not do the preaching, but is a sort of overseer of the work. Even after many years of residence and study of the language few missionaries attain such command of Japanese as to be independent of the native pastor. In fact it is the habit of the tactful missionary, who, of course, knows the language sufficiently to get on with all usual matters like conversation and even teaching, to put the stress upon the ministries of the native preachers and pastors, and thus develop as rapidly as possible the resources and abilities of the native churches.

The Disciples have six congregations in Tokio, besides all their educational work. There is the Hongo Church, of which Prof. Frank Naotaro Otsuka is the preacher, and Rev. Fred E. Hagin, misionary; the Kioshikawa Church, above mentioned; the Ushigome Church, where Miss Oldham and Miss Rioch are in charge, and Pastor Murayama is the preacher; and the Takinagawa Church, over which Prof. Alfred W. Place has supervision, and of which Pastor Hirei is the preacher. These four churches are supported by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. In addition there is the independent work of Rev. W. D. Cunningham at the Yotsuya Mission, with Pastor Hosogai as preacher; and the Kamitomizaka Church in charge of Rev. J. M. McCaleb, with Pastor Hiratsuka as the preacher. This church is supported by the churches of the non-coöperating group in America that is, those who work, if at all, independently of the F. C. M. S. The names of these congregations are indicative of the streets or localities in which they are placed. They number from fifty to a hundred members each, and are the fruit of great devotion and earnestness on the part of the leaders and members.

On Sunday morning Prof. Otsuka came to the hotel to take us to the church. He was accompanied by his wife and little child. When he took his degree at the University of Chicago some years ago, and returned to Japan determined to devote himself to Christian work, he had no immediate prospects of employment in connection with our mission work, either in the churches or schools. But he proved his worth by his own efforts, and made himself a necessity to the mission in Tokio. Soon after his return to Japan he sent us the photograph of himself and his young wife, and we thought we had never seen a more attractive face than that of the bride. When we met her in the parlor of the Seiyoken Hotel that morning it was evident that the picture had told the truth.

We rode for more than a half hour before we reached the church. It is a plain wooden structure, on a thickly settled street. The missionary, Mr. Davey, welcomed us, and as it was already late, the service began at once. The room was well filled, and several of the missionaries, those whose work could spare them at that hour were present. Among them were Prof. and Mrs. Place, Mr. and Mrs. Davey, Mr. and Mrs. Hagin, Miss Kate Johnson, Miss Mary Rioch, Miss Bertha Slawson, Miss Edith Parker, Miss L. J. Wirick and Miss Lavinia Oldham. Pres. Ishikawa of the Bible College, and most of the Japanese leaders of our work were also there. The order that prevailed was admirable. Each one of the members, as he entered the church, bowed low at the door, as is the custom of the Japanese, who are perhaps the politest people in the world. In many services I have watched with interest this careful regard for all the proprieties. If the service has begun, the worshiper makes this low bow at the door, and again at the end of the pew he is about to enter. It is as though he greeted the audience of his fellow worshipers, and apologized for being late!

Each one as he took his seat bowed a moment in silent prayer. When the hymn was begun the music of "Safely Through Another Week" brought recollections of another Sunday, years ago, when we found ourselves in Berlin at the opening of the University year. People and language were alike unfamiliar, and there was a touch of homesickness in the situation as we started out to find a place of worship. But as we went up the steps of the nearest church we could find we heard that well-known air, and felt at once at home. So again in far Japan we responded in heart to the music, though the words were so different from our own.

At the reading of Scripture every one present followed, Bible in hand. Most of the women brought their Bibles and hymn-books, tied up in a cloth. A group of young people rendered a simple hymn in an earnest and pleasing manner. The Lord's Supper was celebrated under the leadership of two of the Japanese pastors. Indeed the entire service was in Japanese except the sermon, which was translated paragraph by paragraph by Prof. Otsuka. At the close of the service the greetings of the missionaries and Japanese Christians were a joy to the visitors. It was delightful to meet there in the house of God these men and women most of whom we had never met before, and whose speech was so different from our own, but whose names are written in heaven, and whose daily testimony is in behalf of Jesus Christ.

In the afternoon, as is the custom in most places where there are missionaries of several groups, there was a union meeting at the Union Methodist Church, of which Dr. J. Campbell is the director. There must have been nearly two hundred people, Americans and English, in attendance. As one looked over that audience, representing a variety of Christian denominations at work in the common task of the Christianization of that city, he had a new conception of the value to missions of a resident group of men and women who are the living representatives of our holy faith. What would it not have meant to Paul in his evangelistic work if he could have felt that behind all his efforts in the cities he reached there was the substantial influence of a cultured and consecrated company of Christians to enforce his message with their lives.

A Street Scene in Tokio.

From that service Brother Hagin took us back to the hotel, and in his company we closed our first Sunday in Japan; a day that has been followed by other as pleasant and profitable, but by none that can have for us the unique significance of that first day with the Christian workers, both of our own brotherhood and of others, laboring so nobly and so hopefully for the cause of Christ in the Sunrise Empire.

Sundered Churches Seek Co-operation

Quadrennial Gathering of Federal Council of Churches of Christ Reveals Great Visions and Actual Achievements in Cause of Christian Unity

The Federation of Churches held its Council in Chicago, Dec. 4-9. It was a strongly representative body. Such a big-headed gathering of men is not often seen in an assembly room of the La Salle Hotel, which is now the favorite convention hotel of the city. And they were big-hearted, too, with a disposition to overlook differences and get together.

The multiplicity of meetings made the occasion rather difficult for reporters and piled up such a mass of matter that nobody in journalism could think of putting more than a mere fraction of it in type. All that can be done with it is to touch a spot here and there. Anything else would have been killing to the news gatherer and also to the reader.

The President's Address.

Bishop E. R. Hendrix, of the Southern M. E. Church, president of the Federation, took as the subject of his opening address "A Symphony of Prayer by the Federated Churches." The bishop's thought was that agreement in prayer is God's beginning point for union, and brings his blessing as well as harmony or spirit among believers. "The best that God has," said the president, "is for believers who symphonize, thoroughly agree with one another and so with the divine Lord, and who are at one when they pray. Our Lord uses the same word for describing Christian unity in worship that is used to describe the most perfect form of music. True prayer is a symphony and is irresistible. Nothing will be withheld from souls that symphonize in prayer (Matthew 18:19) when the personal desires are all sub-ordinated to the work and coming of the kingdom, when human selfishness becomes Christ-like sacrifice, and individual differences disappear in united efforts and common aims such as Christ alone can inspire. The church of our Lord can wear the keys of heaven at her girdle if she will. The Lord saw Satan falling like lightning from heaven when his disciples were of one mind.

A Complete Christ.

"But our vision must take in more than the vastness of the field—it must hold the riches of grace in Christ Jesus. No fragment of Christ can inspire us to the accomplishment of this great task however complete and glorious his humanity. We need the risen, glorified, ascended, reigning Christ if we would know the power of his resurrection. It was only from such a Christ could come the great commission to share his gospel with all men, in all places and for all times. Only the voice of a divine Christ, declared to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead in the power of the Holy Ghost, can give a world-wide command which sounds out until the end of time. Sir Isaac Newton dwelt among the infinities of space and power as he prayed, 'God thy light! Then we can see what we should do. God, thy strength! then we will do what we must do. God, thy blessing, thy grace, then we can do what we want to do.' Dr. Alexander McLaren well says, 'Paul always catches fire whenever he is brought to think or speak of the world-wide destination of the gospel and the honor bestowed on him in entrusting him with the task of transforming the church from a Jewish sect to a world-wide communion. There is no greater revolution in the history of the world than that accomplished through him in cutting Christianity loose from Judaism and widening the church to include the race.' When Paul saw the face of Christ outshine the sun he was getting ready for this great service. He then saw his own littleness in the vision of Christ's greatness, for Jesus Christ is both the condemnation of what we are and the promise of what we can be. He is the center of all things and the final interpretation of the universe. With Augustine we need a whole Christ for our salvation, a whole church for our fellowship, a whole Bible for our staff and a whole heaven for our home. When the word 'all' occurs in the Bible not less than 5,700 times it is to give us the sublime vision of a mighty salvation. Only by living in eternity can we do a real day's work in time. 'And this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou didst send.'

Where We Can Agree.

"Now we can surely agree in our prayers on that which our Lord commanded us to pray for. We cannot pray amiss when we pray the Lord of the harvest to thrust forth laborers into his harvest. The command no more implies urgency that it requires united, importunate intercession. To thrust out is the same word our Lord employed when he is said to have cast out devils. There is mighty resistance to be overcome. Christ's power is measured by the inertia that he overcame no less than the positive antagonism he has to conquer.

Women Praying for Husbands.

"The country has seen our women in time of war gather in prayer for their husbands and brothers and sons who were hurrying to the battle line. Covers have been slipped from pianos and carpets from the floors and families have eaten off bare tables that the wounded might have covering and lint and bandages for their wounds. In the darkest days women have gathered in prayer to the God of battles, because their whole natures were aroused in behalf of the cause for which their kindred lay down their lives. Before the full forces are released through which God can save the world there must be like sacrifices and like united intercession. Not only should the churches have these seasons for common prayer, but in many a Christian woman's home the times of mere social intercourse should be lifted into the scarred hands of our Lord as the very cards of invitation bear the words 'At Home for Intercessory Prayer.'

The Venture of Faith.

"The venture of faith will follow such an inspiring vision and such a dynamic of prayer. Our sons and daughters will go to the front where they will get near to our Lord himself on the firing line when there is such a spirit of passionate, intercessory prayer at home. The Federal Council of the churches should be above everything else 'A League of Intercession.' It should be less an organization to do what the individual churches are set to do than an inspiration and a great clearing house of the churches where they may send in their bulletins of victory and hearten one another in the work of the Lord. The Church of Christ can never survive its Pentecosts."

Conference on State and Local Federations

Rev. Joseph Hayes Chandler opened this conference with an address, in which he referred to the progress made and welcomed the delegates to the great center of the country's progress and activities.

"Exceptional even is the minister," said Dr. Chandler, "who has come to realize that American Protestantism has really entered upon a new era. For as yet, are they who conceive of the real reformation as a present experience going on to longer fulfillment. From this historical perspective we realize that the sixteenth century saw only the beginning of the Protestant reformation. The twentieth century ushers in the realization of a new unity for which the earlier dispersion was only a means to an end.

The Heart of the United States.

"In speaking for the city to which you have come for a week's stay, I cannot say you meet at 'the hub of the universe,' that particular location having been previously preëmpted. But you are in a place more favorable for your special practical task as American churchmen, for you are in the heart of your own United States.

"That most precious American heritage, the Puritan conscience is here, modified and modernized indeed but in no wise decadent or deposed from a position of commanding authority. It is dominant in the pupils of the 600 Federated Churches of Chicago. It is heard in the preaching of Dr. Gunsaulus in the great Auditorium in the very heart of the city every Sunday morning. It dominates the messages by many voices in Orchestra Hall, on the evening of the Lord's Day, in the services of the Sunday Evening Club. These are in the best sense gospel services, for it is a full orbed gospel for the saving of the individual and of the corporate life of the city. Its founder and controlling spirit, Clifford W. Barnes, is a great citizen, the head of the committee of 15 for the suppression of the social evil, an officer of the American Vigilance Association, closely associated with the Municipal and Legislative Voters' League and allied with every good work for social betterment—and the best citizenship of Chicago is behind him and with him.

Must Federate the Ranks.

"Federation of national assemblies is an accomplished fact. Let us thank God and take courage. But the larger task remains of making Federation at the top effective at the bottom and all the way between. So and so only, can American Protestantism present to the world a united front. We have united the leaders, but the generals do not constitute an army. It remains to unite the rank and file. To institute everywhere a policy not of "hands off," but of hands together, in community churches where only one church is needed; in a cooperative parish plan between churches which have a real field and a present-day mission; in a civic church whose united forces shall save our cities; in the re-enthronment everywhere of the Church of Christ in the community. You have come together here in the heart of the United States to give a week to planning measures and methods which shall make for church union in this country, in every part of it. This is the prime purpose of this assembly. Whatever else enters our discussions is of altogether secondary importance. Our sessions must begin, continue and end in planning for a United Church for the United States.

Pray As We Plan.

"And we must not only plan, but pray. In an Illinois village of 600 people last summer, I spoke to the members of three little churches which for the glory of Christ and the good of the community ought to federate in one community church. After my address, I invited questions. A leading citizen arose and said, 'We do not need to ask questions. We know what we ought to do. What we need is the gift of the Holy Spirit to overcome our prejudices and make us willing to do our plain duty.' The service ended that Sunday night in a twenty minutes after meeting in which men and women poured out their hearts before God as I have seldom known in the height of our revival season. That single meeting was a revival Church federation is a revival measure. It means new heart and new hope in the church; new power over them without; new graces of love and goodwill and brotherly kindness in the hearts of Christians kept apart by divisions which have no reason for existence except in the mystery of the power of the rulers of the darkness of this world."

Social Service Conference

Thirty denominations were represented in the Social Service Conference, and the subjects under discussion proved fruitful in provoking a wide variety of opinions.

The program embraced the discussion of the nature and phases of the social problem, and under this was considered the task of social amelioration looking toward eventual social readjustment, or reconstruction The problem is no longer regarded as local or national, but is world-wide and embraces in it the whole program of democracy Under the general discussion such topics as the industrial situation, the relation of employer to employe, the negro problem and the immigration problem were considered.

Charles Stelzle, with his training and experience of the last ten years, spoke with authority on the program of the church in a factory district, and also of the church which appeals to a foreign-speaking people. His experiences, as well as those of Harry Ward, who was trained for his work in a Methodist church located in the Stock Yards district of Chicago, were helpful and illuminating.

The Country Problem.

Then there is the country district, where the land was once tilled by those who owned it but is now in the hands of renters. Warren H. Wilson has been at work on this country problem for a number of years and his accounts of surveys taken and the conditions that exist, as well as his practical suggestions as to how the problem can be solved and the church made effective in the rural districts, was made more convincing because he had figures and facts of actual results to bring before the conference. And so the discussion progressed. Methods, workers, their training, the relationship of the universities, colleges and theological seminaries to the social service program of the churches, were all brought under review by the gathering.

What the Denominations Are Doing.

Nine of the leading denominations have Social Service Commissions now at work. The Presbyterians and the Baptists are under the direction and control of the Home Missionary Boards of these denominations. The Methodists and the Episcopalians are independent commissions. The Congregational is in charge of the Brotherhood. The Disciples of Christ have a definitely empowered commission with Prof. Alva. W. Taylor as secretary.

The executive secretaries of these denominational agencies have been brought together by a vote of the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of the Churches and form a Cabinet on Social Service, and through this relationship are made associate secretaries of the Federal Council, so that each man represents not only his own denomination but also the entire Protestant forces of America. Through the cabinet plans are under way for the issuance of a series of handbooks on Social Service and other literature which will be distributed in the interest of a common cause.

Value of the Conference.

This conference helped to clarify the ideas of the social service workers themselves. It helped to bring about a more perfect agreement as to what should constitute the real program of social service and its relationship to the established agencies of the church, such as home missions, and was successful in bringing about a more real spirit of co-operation among the various agencies at work in the different churches. It is safe to say that with the inspiration of this conference the Social Service Cabinet of the Federal Council will become more effective and will be the means of bringing about more definite results than ever before.

The Standard of Living.

Rev. Harry E. Ward, secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Social Service Commission, said: "There is a standard of living below which industrial production costs a deficit in human life. The church must get legislation to hold production above this standard. It must remove the conditions that cause the present deficit in life. The church has been shown to be impotent where laborers are kept below this scale. Industrial production is not yet awake to its own object—not the production of goods but the promotion of life for those who work. The real aim of the church must be to bring about an industrial condition which all elements agree is just."

Judge McKenzie Cleland, speaking on the same general topic, said: "The greatest problem we have to meet today is to counteract the detrimental, pernicious influence of the criminal court. Criminal justice is based on everything contrary to Christian religion. On Sunday the church preaches the golden rule; on Monday the criminal court holds that the way to overcome evil is with evil."

In the election of officers, Professor Shailer Mathews was chosen president, and the other officers were re-elected.

Unity of Church and Nations

Vice-president-elect Thomas R. Marshall said that he is and has been from his childhood a member of the Presbyterian church of Columbia City, Ind. The governor referred feelingly to his long affiliation with that congregation. "It was my parents' church and mine," he added, "and our family is named in the memorial windows there. I have never withdrawn my affiliation. It is a small congregation, but an exceedingly lively one, for we have no fewer than eight office holders, and I think we are branching out for more jobs. Referring to church union, Gov rnor Marshall said: "I do not look for any union of the churches as regards creed to grow out of the work of this council. When I was sent here by my denomination, the Presbyterian, I was told that the council is not willing to reduce our beliefs to one form. You know the situation is similar to that of political parties. In previous campaigns I have always contended that there were two sides to every political question. But the campaign just closed was the first in which there were three sides to a question, and it is the first time I have ever met this condition—outside of geometry."

Union of Races.

Dr. James A. McDonald, the Toronto Globe editor, spread the melting pot over large space. "We hear about changing China and the changing East," he said. "We hear about changing America and the changing West, but what is happening is a changing world. Not New York alone or Chicago or San Francisco or Winnipeg or Vancouver is the melting pot. The whole world is becoming one vast melting pot. The supreme problem in world politics is this: How are the nations alien in their instincts, diverse in their history, antagonistic in their purposes, to learn to live together in one world community?

In the presence of the essential gospel there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free. In view of the world situation the duty of the churches of America is to guard against overlapping here and shortage there, and to marshall all their forces for a united and systematic campaign to Christianize this American nation.

Not Very Christian.

"Neither Britain nor America," continued Dr. McDonald, "can in any high sense be called Christian, having in mind the records of social vice and wrong, of business graft and dishonesty, which make up the story of the recent election campaign.

"There is a new cry; it is for social justice. There is a brave call; it is for social service. These are the marks of the Christian nation. They are the work of the churches. Equal opportunity for all, special privileges for none, is the fundamental idea of Christian brotherhood.

"The nations all subscribe to the doctrines of international peace and pay dignified respect to the theory of independent international arbitration, but as an aid to even diplomacy among themselves they maintain huge and costly armies and navies If individuals are counted half-civilized who go about each with a knife in his boot and threatening to draw a gun on the slightest provocation, are not the nations also uncivilized and pagan whose recourse for justice is to brute force and not to law?"

Against War.

Dr. J. B. Remensnyder, chairman of the commission on peace and arbitration, insisted that leadership in the cause of international arbitration should be assumed by the churches.

"We would ask pastors and members of churches," he said, "to watch closely the action of Congress, and whenever measures are introduced involving world peace that they write their senators and representatives and urge that they vote from the Christian standpoint. We believe the time has come when civilization must make choice between the way of statesmanship and the way of battleship; the old way of settling disputes, by force, or the new of settling them, by justice. We call upon the Christian men and women of the nation to rise at this time and demand that all nations learn again the teachings of Christ, that the thought of engaging in deadly combat shall become abhorrent and impossible forever."

Conference of Theological Seminaries

One of the most interesting of the conferences called together in connection with the meeting of the council was the gathering attended by about sixty representatives of theological seminaries from all parts of the country. They held four sessions together and one joint session with the representatives of the Social Service group.

The program was a very wide one, simply proposing subjects for discussion under six main heads: Co-ordination of college and seminary curricula; Balance between intellectual and practical disciplines; Training for social service; Standardization of Seminary curricula; Informing purpose of the Seminary; Function of the Seminary in the training of preachers. Under each of these heads a large number of detailed items were printed and the discussion was given large liberty in the various fields.

President George B. Stewart of Auburn, the chairman, was fertile in suggestion and wise and kindly in his guidance of the debate.

Wandered at Will.

The brethren evidently felt the sense of freedom that the wide range of the program warranted, for they wandered at will in all the green fields and beside the pleasant water courses of the program. The rooms were crowded and the air was stuffy; but there was a delightful temper in the conference and a disposition to hear everybody on everything. Inasmuch as an able committee was watching the discussion under instruction to formulate the judgment of the conference, this probably was the best method that could have been followed.

When this committee came to present its conclusions in the last session it was found that there had been three main matters under consideration.

Leaders for Churches.

One of these was the kind of training that was to be afforded. There was no hesitation in the judgment of the conference that the seminaries are in existence for the purpose of training leaders for churches in the twentieth century, and not to preserve either the traditional curriculum or the methods of the past if these cannot fit men for the task of leadership. On the other hand it was not demonstrated to the conference that the four greater divisions of the conventional curriculum, exegetical, historical, systematic, and practical theology, had ceased to be the major tasks of the seminary teaching. It was expressed as the judgment of the conference, however, that to these should be added strong courses on Pedagogy, Sociology, and Comparative Religion.

Training for Social Service.

It was in the discussion of the training that was to be given by the seminaries in the specific practice of social service that the most interesting discussion was deevloped. That there were many members of the conference in heartiest accord with the social program of the churches appeared at once. Not only so, but they were among the leaders in the modern movement for the enlistment of the church in the social task of the changing order, such men as Professors Rauschenbusch, Thomas Hall and Shailer Mathews. They spoke in the various discussions with clear conviction as to the meaning of the social movement and the task of the seminaries. Dr. Mathews especially defined clearly the work of the seminary as the vocational school to train leaders for churches. The making of sociologists was not the business of the seminary, as he and Dr. Hall alike conceived it. Social service was to be given a place in the work of the institution and students were to be shown how to relieve suffering and to study the housing conditions of a neighborhood.

The Major Task.

But that was not the major task. Dr. Hall said specifically that in the Seminary men were to be given the "social passion." Dr. Mathews said that this was something that could not be taught. By implication he meant that it was something that must be "caught." He stated that he was not primarily concerned with courses of study that would teach the detailed methods of charitable work and philanthropic administration, but rather with those disciplines and with that spirit that would make students efficient leaders of the churches. He was concerned with the "religion" of the seminaries supremely.

There was a clear definition of purpose in the conference to the effect that the seminaries should train their students to know first of all the facts concerning God and man and their mutual relations; then, and because of the vital relation between God and man, to concern themselves with the relations between man and man. Nothing was to be ignored, but first things were to be made first.

It was a clear and refreshing pronouncement. The friends of social work in the churches could have asked for no warmer

Wiliam Woods College for girls, at Fulton, Mo., received a Thanksgiving gift of $19,200 from Mrs. Mary C. Edwards, which in conformity with his offer, Dr. Woods of Fulton duplicated with a gift of his own, thus increasing the endowment to $38,400.

A Fair Warning.

"If I were You and You were I," was Pastor W. A. Moore's sermon subject at First Church, Tacoma, Wash., on a recent Sunday morning. He advised in advance that he preferred the members of the church to refrain from inviting outsiders to that service, and to come themselves prepared to stay through, "whether you like it or not, because if you leave before the close of the sermon you might miss something that hits you harder than the things at first said."

Foreign Society Gains.

The receipts for Foreign Missions during the month of November amounted to $7,952, a gain of $4,079 over the same month last year. The receipts for the first two months of the new missionary year, beginning October 1, amounted to $14,971, showing a gain in the regular receipts of $6,114. However, there has been a loss in annuity gifts of $1,500, but a gain in bequests of $994.

Growth of Columbus Church.

West Fourth Avenue Church, Columbus, O., raised for all purposes in the past year, $6,554.96. $1,002.83 of this was given for missions. The Sunday-school enrolls 756 and is running over 400 in attendance. There were 90 additions during the year; present membership, 716. T. L. Lowe, the minister, is closing his fourth year with this congregation. During that time the church debt of $3,000 has been lifted and $2,000 spent on improvements to care for the rapidly growing work. During the four years, 314 persons were added to the church.

A Record Breaking School.

The Sunday-school of the church at Tipton, Ind., surpassed all previous records for attendance in its annual rally. The attendance of the individual classes ranged from 15 to 224. The total attendance of the school was 1,153. The rally day service maintained the integrity of the lesson study period. Programs were offered from both the auditorium and basement floors of the church. There were 89 young men in the Young Men's Class, taught by Prof. Patterson of the city schools, and 224 men in the Men's class, taught by the minister of the church, G. I. Hoover.

An Efficiency Tour.

I. J. Cahill, state secretary for Ohio, has just finished a tour including a number of centers in a campaign for efficiency. Arrangements for the tour were made by the state secretary of the Brotherhood, D. W. Teachout, of Cleveland. The tour was conducted by Pres. M. E. Baker, of the Ohio Brotherhood, Pres. M. L. Bates of Hiram College and Mr. Cahill. The cities included were Toledo, Marion, Mansfield, Dayton, Portsmouth and Akron. In each case men were gathered from surrounding churches and a meeting was addressed by the three speakers upon various phases of efficiency in the work of the church.

Turns Birthday Dinner to Practical Account.

At a dinner given by Dr. Montgomery, Philadelphia's well-known physician, celebrating his forty years of membership in First Church there the men of the church pledged the money and their support for a modest institutional work upon which a beginning has already been made. The pastor, Irving S. Chenoweth reports a growing Sunday-school and evening congregation. The members of First Church are scattered over the entire city, but there is evident a determination to render effective service to the particular neighborhood in which their house of worship stands.

Dr. McCash Lectures at Drake University.

Dr. I. N. McCash, Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, delivered a series of six lectures for the students of the College of the Bible, of Drake University, December 3-5. The subjects of his lectures were, (1) A Historical Survey of American Missions, (2) A Regional Survey of the Unmet Religious Needs, (3) Foreign Factors in American Life, (4) Municipality and Missions, (5) Efficient Church Loyalty, (6) America Democratizing the World. These lectures are said to have been of a very high standard and represented a great deal of research and careful preparation.

Good Reason for Rejoicing.

W. W. Burks, pastor of Central Church, Walla Walla, Wash., writes that he has many reasons for rejoicing in these days. He says: "The congregations fill our large auditorium at the regular services, and there are frequently additions to the membership. The Sunday-school is one of the largest in Eastern Washington. The C. W. B. M. Auxiliary gave a fine program, Dec. 1, and received an offering of $100. Our church membership is near the 800 mark, and no preacher could covet a more loyal and devoted people. We have one of the finest equipments among our churches and located strategically in the 'Garden City' of Washington."

Office Bearers to Support Mid-week Services.

The official board of George Darsie's Terre Haute, Ind., Church, put itself squarely behind the mid-week prayer meeting by passing unanimously the following resolution: "Inasmuch as we, the members of the Official Board, realize the importance and value of being much in prayer for the success of our work and knowing the paramount importance of coming together as a church at least once a week to ask God's blessing upon our efforts and His guidance in the conduct of our affairs, be it resolved that we get behind the prayer meeting and by our example and our talk increase the attendance at each meeting and add to the helpfulness of the same." Mr. Darsie points out that the office-bearers, their wives and immediate friends will constitute a nucleus of nearly one hundred people for the prayer meeting. This would guarantee a rich and worthful service every Wednesday evening. Evidently with all their financial burdens, the Terre Haute officers talk about something besides the money problem at their board meetings.

Commends Editor's Meetings.

The pastor, S. Boyd White, writes concerning Editor C. C. Morrison's series of meetings at Lexington, Mo., as follows: "All unite in saying it has been one of the most interesting and fruitful periods in the church's history. We have had C. C. Morrison with us for a week in a series of addresses covering the vital and fundamental issues of religion. The place, policy, and purpose of the Disciples were also set forth in a most illuminating and thoroughly evangelical manner and the entire community around with a new sense of obligation in working intelligently and assiduously at the task of Christian unity. Aside from the high order of the preaching the personal fellowship of the week was most delightful, Mr. Morrison endearing himself to the hearts of our people by his winsome disposition. The church through its official board unanimously passed a resolution of appreciation of the work of Mr. Morrison and invited him to return at some future time for another series of addresses."

A Church School

The graduating exercises of the Church School connected with Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, were held Wednesday evening, Nov. 26. Eighty members of the church received diplomas and twenty others were conditioned and will receive certificates on completing the course. The school was conducted on successive Wednesday evenings during October and November. It was a school of practice and efficiency. The course consisted of sixteen lectures on subjects pertaining to practical church life and work. The school proposed to give the members of the church an opportunity to become acquainted with all the methods of work promoted by the church. It was a "technical" school to prepare the members for intelligent co-operation in all departments of church activity. The following courses were offered:

Church Finance—This included instruction in the development of methods in the local church; an exhibit of the systems employed by the Finance Committee and the church treasurer; the method of finance in the Sunday-school; the history and methods for the financing of church building and enlargement; the provision for meeting deficit and interest, the reduction of mortgage, etc. It was a thorough and practical study of the finance conditions, needs and methods of the local church; an estimate of congregational possibilities and obligation, and a demonstration of possible efficiency through co-operation.

Church Evangelism—A study of the distinctive beliefs of the church and the best methods of propagating them. The duty of the church to the unsaved of the community. Personal evangelism in the city and through the Sunday-school. The use of Christian literature and church advertising. The evangelistic power of regular church services and personal work.

Missions.—A study of the missionary enterprises of the local church. The support of the church's missionaries at home and abroad. The C. W. B. M. work and methods. The local charity district of the church and the care of the poor. The Duplex Envelope System for Missions.

Community Service.—A study of the adaptation of the church to the local community. The use of the Commnuity House. The open church and gymnasium. Survey of the religious and social conditions in the neighborhood. Pastoral aid and neighborliness. Deaconnesses and their duties. The duty of the family church to the family community. The district plan for social organization.

The Sunday-school.—The graded system and department plan. Training of teachers. Organized classes. Associated organizations. Social life of the children. Scouts and camp fire girls.

Church Polity—The Administration of the church through its officers. The duties of elders and deacons. The duties of the pastor. Co-operation of members with officers. Religious life of the church. Importance of public services. Christianity in the home, society and business.

The average attendance upon the school was one hundred and twenty. The preparatory course will be followed by the Church College in which advanced work will be taken and persons enrolled will be trained for specific work within the church and community. It is expected that every graduate of the Church College will be prepared to do well some definite thing. The preparatory course will be given each year to the new members and these in turn will be taken into the Church College for training for specific service.

The graduating exercises for the Preparatory School were conducted at the church. A fine program of music was rendered and a handsome diploma given to each graduate. Dr. A. V. V. Raymond, ex-president of Union College, addressed the graduates. Already the effects of this preparatory work are manifested in the church life. There is deeper interest and closer co-operation as well as enlargment in many departments of the church work.

Foreign Society News

Miss Doris Ware, daughter of James Ware, Shanghai, China, is a student in Drake University, preparing herself for the work of kindergarten teaching on the mission field.

A severe storm passed over Japan to the injury of the property of the Foreign Society. The amount of damage, however, was not very large.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Burner, students of Transylvania University and the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., were appointed missionaries of the Foreign Society at the regular monthly meeting of the Executive Committee, December 6. Also Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Moody were appointed. The future place of their labors has not been definitely fixed.

There are a number of new Livink-links swinging into line. The prospects now are bright for more new Living-links than we have ever had in any one year.

Referring to the loss by fire in the printing plant at Jubbulpore, India, G. W. Brown says, "All feel that our literary work is so important that we must not permit it to be hampered. Plans have been approved for a new building. The advisory committee sanctions the immediate rebuilding of the press and the purchase of supplies necessary to carry on the most indispensible part of our work. The Chritian Sahakak (Hindi paper) will go out, but will be only half size. I hope that you may confirm the action of our advisory committee and that we may get to work at once. I have the plans drawn for the new building. I do hope that you will be able to get us going soon."

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, writing from the Philippines, says, "Everything moes along. Sunday-school is growing rapidly. Will open a new church soon in Tondo, as we have a Sunday-school of over 50 members now."

The Decennial Celebration of our people in the Philippine Islands was an occasion of great rejoicing among our missionaries and all our Christians. There were 800 that sat down at one time at communion service. The churches are greatly encouraged. Baptisms occur almost daily and new congregations are being organized and new houses are being erected. We have ground for great rejoicing over the work in the Philippines.

Our missionaries in Japan are very anxious to open a new station in Nagoya, about half way between Tokyo and Osaka. It is said that this city is growing at the rate of 25,000 annually. The population is not very far from half a million. We have a number of Christians residing there already and they would like to enter into an organization and help push the work.

Home Mission Notes

M. M. Moss, Vancouver, B. C., reports 43 additions to the church in the evangelistic meeting led by J. W. Baker. A new home of worship has been built at a cost of $10,500.

South Side Christian Church, Billings, Mont., was dedicated the first Lord's day in December. The building was not quite completed, and the pews were not in place, but an indebtedness of $2,600 was provided for in pledges amounting to $3,085.65. Pastor Maples and his people were exceedingly happy over the dedicatory services.

During the month of November the corresponding secretary visited all the southern conventions—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama. The work of the south is in a prosperous condition. The North Carolina convention was especially well attended with over 150 delegates. They transacted business in a most effective way. Atlantic Christian College is in the hearts of the people and the president, Bro. Caldwell, as well. The convention decided to raise $100,000 on an endowment.

championship than their emphasis found in the conference; but at the some time the representatives of the seminaries were not confused concerning relative values or the importance of their primary function. It cleared the minds of some men to have the first things placed first in such distinct fashion.

A Study of the Gray Book

To every delegate to the Federal Council and to every attendant at its meetings a gray covered, paper-bound booklet was given. This "gray book" was the text book of the council. It contains multum in parvo. Knowing its contents one could easily and accurately "discern signs of our times." Even a hurried reading of the gray book would prove to any discouraged saint that the church is not decadent but successful. But a patient study of it would reveal in how many directions the church of today is endeavoring to be the salt of the earth and the light of the world. The church is no longer content to save a few selected individuals from a shipwrecked world; it would save the world. "The world," this report insists, is "the subject of redemption." The church's task, the gray book declares, is to leaven the entire lump of society.

Its Table of Contents.

The program of the Council appears on the first half dozen pages. Then follow reports of committees and secretaries of the Federal Council. That is all interesting and informing. But the most valuable part of the gray book is the part devoted to the reports of the standing committees of the Federal Council. The first of these reports is that prepared and given by Dr. James L. Barton in which he recites the growth of co-operation in foreign missionary fields from 1908 until 1912. It is a great document by a missionary statesman.

Home Missionary Work.

The next report indicates how much co-operation there is on home missionary fields. The report begins by confessing that our brethren in India, China and Japan are far ahead of us in this matter of church unity It says: There are about as many distinct home mission societies and boards as there are separate religious denominations The greatest undertaking of human history, the Christian conquest and settlement of a virile new continent, is being attempted without any concert of action. The divisions of the army of occupation are more or less sympathetic—often less—but they have no common plan of campaign. Sometimes they even appear to be in conflict with each other. Worst of all, the irrational situation is inveterate. It is too deep and solemnly entrenched to be overcome by declamation or by any hasty devices.

Invasion of Foreign Religions.

Another investigation brings out these startling facts: That Buddhism in Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles is aggressively propagating itself from these cities as centers. Buddhist temples have been erected, in which cultured priests administer the rites and ceremonies of their religion, and through a series of lectures in various parts of those cities are reaching large numbers of Americans, especially women. Christianity is thus being put on the defensive and is grappling in the struggle with the religions and cults of the Orient. Recently thousands of Hindus have come. Next to nothing is being done for them.

Home, Marriage, and Divorce.

Dr. George P. Eckman, the new editor of the Christian Advocate of New York, prepared and presented the report of the "Committee on Family Life." He first mentions the agencies that are destructive of family solidarity, and insists that the most deteriorating social influence is the decline of family religion. He recommends:

(1) Uniform marriage and divorce laws such as are now in process of enactment by the states.

(2) Comity between the churches "so that persons who cannot be married by their own ministers will not resort to those of other churches for that object."

(3) "Great care in the marriage of persons unknown to the officiating clergyman and of those who are morally and physically unfit for married life."

(4) Attention "to the terrible evils of sexual vice by the clergy, teachers and parents, in ways that are wise and efficient."

(5) Such instruction as shall lead Christians "to see that the family has its true place in the activities of religion, education, industry and public order."

Sunday Observance.

The report of the committee on Sunday Observance shows how aggressive and persistent the anti-Sunday forces of the land are. It says: Perhaps never in the history of the American republic have the attacks on the observance of Sunday been so severe as in the past year of 1910-1911. In the six New England states, thirty-six bills were presented to the state legislatures to legalize commercial and amusement schemes on

213 CHURCH BUILDINGS ERECTED WITH OUR ANNUITY FUND

What It Is!

THE ANNUITY PLAN

How It Works!

In Our Church Extension Fund

at Kansas City, Mo.

What It Is—Through our Annuity Plan you can administer upon your own estate by putting your money into our Church Extension Fund. This is far better than making a bequest because the Board will pay you 6 per cent, in semi-annual payments, if you are fifty years old or more, and the interest will be paid to your wife if she survives you. Between the ages of forty and forty-nine the rate is 5 per cent, and 4 per cent between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine.

ITS GREAT ADVANTAGES TO YOU

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no trouble or losses in making reinvestments.
3. You have no taxes nor attorneys' fees to pay and your income is regular.
4. The Society is perpetual and is incorporated. Its funds are perpetual and are loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. Your money is safe because the Annuity Bond which the Board issues you is as good as a Government Bond because it is backed up by all the assets of the Fund, which now amount to over $1,015,276 and which will constantly increase.
6. We receive remittance of $100, or as many hundreds or thousands as you can send, and your money will be received at any time and the Bond will be dated so that your interest begins at once.

How Your Money Works—The Board does not invest your money in some secular enterprise and WAIT FOR YOU TO DIE before using it in the work of Church Extension. All of our Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to aid promising congregations to build. The money is returned by the churches using it in five equal, annual installments, and as fast as it returns it goes out again and again to build churches. Your money is thus in a PERPETUAL WHIRL OF DOING GOOD, because we have more demands for Annuity money than we can answer. Our mission churches in the new Southwest are glad to get Annuity money from the Board of Church Extension and pay 6 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more than is charged for the regular funds. They then have their loans in the hands of their friends.

Our Annuity Fund has received 355 gifts and $354,257.26, with which 213 church buildings have been erected.

We can use $100,000 this year. Send remittances at once and give your full legal name and your age. Write to Sunday. While all but one was defeated it has been announced that they will continually be presented to the state legislatures until they are passed. Similar conditions are in New York, Maryland and other states, so that the battle is on.

A Jubilant Note.

There is, however, a jubilant note in the report. It rejoices thot more than half a million toilers have Sunday as a day of rest who did not have it a year ago. It is thankful that 75,000 postal clerks have either been freed from Sunday labor or have had their work reduced to a minimum. The report says: It is gratifying to know that 90 per cent of the postoffices are closed on Sunday. Because of the postal deficit of $17,500,000 the government took up this matter cautiously, but to their surprise, after twelve months of Sunday closing, instead of a deficit, there was a surplus of $300,000, being a net gain of $18,000,000. Already the Secretary of the Navy has given orders for the reduction of Sunday work on the naval vessels and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has expressed his recognition of the importance of this question and is now planning an investigation. Likewise the railroads are seeking to reduce Sunday work, especially the Pennsylvania and the Northwestern, for they are beginning to see that their enployes do better work with rest on one day in seven than seven days of uninterrupted toil.

Temperance.

The report of the Committee on Temperance bids us to note these signs of advance: The saloonkeeper is today a pariah. The grog-selling tavernkeeper is no longer an influential man in community; the still house is not run by elders and deacons. Public sentiment has changed. All business now demands sobriety in employes. This is emphatically true of the railroads. By their official action the railroads give us a million and a half of sober men. The Pullman company has eliminated intoxicants from its dining cars and so have a number of great railroads. More than twenty million school children are, by the requirements of law, taught the perils of alcohol. Likewise the newspapers and best magazines, refuse to accept a demoralizing liquor advertisement.

But perhaps the best proof that the temperance cause is progressing is the fact that the statesmen of the great nations of the world now regard the liquor problem as a great world problem. To solve that problem they have organized the International Alcoholic Congress. This congress meets biennially. It is attended by eminent medical specialists as well as by statesmen. Our own nation is officially represented at this congress.

Religious Education.

That the Sunday-school is the most influential agency of religious instruction is the initial contention of the report of the Committee on Literature and Education. The report maintains that the Sunday-school work of the church has improved during the last quadrennium. It declares that the church's maintenance and promotion of her preparatory schools, colleges and theological seminaries has remained at about the same degree of efficiency and interest as at the beginning of this period. It urges that the new demand for facilities for the proper training of laymen and laywomen for Christian service be provided for. And it recommends that the work now assigned to this committee be divided and that hereafter there be a committee on literature and a commission on the church and religious education.

Weekday Religious Instruction.

Dr. George Wenner begins his report of the "Special Committee to Consider Ways and Means to Promote Week-day Instruction in Religion," by reminding us of the resolution that was adopted by the Interchurch Conference on Federation in its meeting in New York in 1905, "recommending for the favorable consideration of the public school authorities of the country the proposal to allow the children to absent themselves without detriment from the public schools on Wednesday, or on some other afternoon of the school week, for the purpose of attending religious instruction in their own churches; and urging upon the churches the advisability of availing themselves of the opportunity so granted to give such instruction in addition to that given on Sunday."

Education and Religion.

He notes a deepening appreciation of the need of religion in the education of the young of the land and rejoices in the widespread interest that educationalists have "in all plans that will further that end." "The lack of religious restraints," he says, "is generally acknowledged to be a serious defect in the American system of public education." With sorrow he confesses that there are too many practical objections to the plan of devoting half a day each week to the task of ethically and religiously instructing the youth of the land in their own churches. While there is a note of pessimism in the report it concludes with these inspiring words:

Education does not mean the impartation of information. It means the development of character.

Religion Not Dogma.

It is generally conceded that without religion there can be no true education. We do not confound religion with dogma. We know very well that religion is a life. It cannot be taught. It must be imparted. But we also know that the Christian Church in her fellowship of faith, and in the divine forces with which she has been endowed by her Master, has the resources that are required for the development of soul and character which is the aim of true education.

On the other hand, the precepts of morality, unsupported by faith in God and the verities of religion, are found to be incapable of producing the highest attainments in character. This is leading many, who for a time have stood aloof from the Christian Church, to recognize her true function as a teacher of the nations in the things that pertain to God and the eternal life.

The Church and Social Service.

To no report is so much space given as to th "Report of the Commission on the Church and Social Service." The commission's plan of work is outlined in detail. The denominational agencies through which the commission works are indicated. A paragraph is devoted to the story of Secretary Macfarland's visit in the summer of 1911 to England and Germany. The more important leaflets and pamphlets published and distributed by the commission are mentioned. The report declares that: The Christian church has the threefold vocation of conscience, interpreter and guide of all social movements. She should determine what their motive and conscience should be, inspire them with that motive and impose that conscience upon them. She should interpret to them their inner and ultimate meaning; then, with a powerful mind and hand and heart, guide them toward their heavenly goal. Her viewpoint is from above; she approaches life from within; she guides it toward its spiritual ends.

Church Not a Political Party.

Nor is the church called upon to assume the political tasks or duties of the nation. The church is to do her work in the social order by bringing to bear upon it the idealism of her Gospel and by infusing it with the impulse of her sympathy. The business of the state is to bring about such economic conditions and environment that the idealism of the Gospel may have as clear and fair a field as possible. It is this that justifies the church, not in entangling herself in economic machinery, but in turning to the state for a co-operation which will enable her to do her sacred task.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the three years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that has even been offered to Sunday-schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., one of the most successful social service leaders of men and young men among the Disciples, thus writes concerning this series:

"I have used THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM with the Greyfriars Class since October, 1908—the first issue—and it is the only Sunday School help that is really worth while for adult classes. It has actually built visible, tangible things for this municipality."

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these clesses in the study of Social Reform.

The Best

Many Sunday School classes will wish to study the life of Christ in 1913. They want the very best text for young people's or adult classes that can be found. This is simply to remind them that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned, as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is being widely used in Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A. classes. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

A Preacher's New Year Resolutions

I SHALL live a life of prayer, believing that my days are ordered of the Lord, and that God has a plan for my life. I shall begin each day seeking guidance in its perplexities and light upon its duties; and close it with gratitude for whatever good has been accomplished, and that all dependent upon me have been able to eat the broad of satisfaction. Relying upon the hand that holds the winds to scatter the terror that walketh in darkness, I shall lie down content to rise on the morrow for a day of service, or to wake in that country whose light is the Lamb. I shall ever rest in the confidence that whether living or dying we are the Lord's.

II.

I shall read the Bible every day for strength and hope. It shall be my text-book, but never a mere book of texts. I am in duty bound to understand that book if I make it plain to others, and I cannot understand myself until I look into its depths. Hence, I must bring to that book the best powers of mind and heart. I shall read it to know what God has done, how men have sung their songs, wrestled with their temptations, inspired their fellows, saved each other from calamity, and in a glorious old age were gathered to their fathers. Through men in divers ways God has wrought. And in divers ways he is still working out his purposes for the race. He works through modern Abrahams as well as through him of ancient time. He has his prophets and teachers now as he had in the long ago. He works modern no less than ancient miracles. To know the true from the false in every age I must know well the Bible. I shall bring all other books to its light for interpretation. I shall look upon it as the sun which gives lustre to all other light, and the sea into which all rivers flow. The Bible shall be to me a granary from which the richness of all books is gathered. I can afford to neglect all other books better than I can afford to neglect this. I must know it if I am to live, and if I am to teach.

III.

I shall try to read the best books of the world. as I have opportunity. I cannot hope to read more than a handful each year; I can only hope to touch the rim of the book-world. And since I cannot read all the good books, I mean to become familiar with those which will be of the greatest service in my life and my work, and those which enter almost uninvited into my fellowship through my natural taste. It is easier to read some great books than others. While time is so fleeting and books so plentiful it does not seem worth while to compel myself to read uncongenial books, no matter if they have secured a place among the immortals. The poets I will read for color and for beauty of language, as well as for the nourishing of all that is fine in my nature. The masters of fiction I will read for delineation of character, for variety of scenery, for the thrilling climax, for description of situations. Biographies I will read for inspiration, for a knowledge of the men whose records have been perserved as an imperishable monument, for the story of their struggles and their triumphs. I will read the biographies to see that there is a unity in the lives of all men whether great or small, and that the extraordinary is but an incident in the life of the few. Histories I will read to gain the knowledge that the march of man is ever uphill, and that despite wars and upheavals man has never stood still. And church history I will read to learn that doctrines have their cradle and their grave, that truth is ever seeking new forms of expression. The man who never finds that out preaches a message that will ever fall upon dead ears. It is there that the preacher must learn that churches sometimes have continued to live with dead men for pew-holders, but that living souls are the channel through which God ever works, souls alive to the meanings of the present as were souls to the meanings of long ago. Therefore, I shall not be indifferent to the eternal messages that are filling the world through books.

IV.

I shall try to use wisely my time, guarding on the one hand against sloth, and on the other against that profitless round of activities, common to the ministry, which may pass for work but is merely a process of putting in the time. I have learned that some activities, like the swimmer's treading water, may demand a great display of energy, but never produce progress. I observe some ministers who spend all their days getting ready for work, but who never put their hand to the plough, a fault common to a multitude, and an always present temptation to me also. I will break that habit of allowing one day after another to pass, and then being driven in sheer desperation to get ready for the work of Sunday. My conscience shall be my watch and whip in this matter of time, so that my days shall not be spent in utter idleness, or in a ferment of trifles which absorb my energies to no purpose. I shall keep my conscience sensitive that my task master may be within my soul and not an outward necessity. I shall strive to manage my time so well that I shall be ready to greet the Lord's day with eagerness and with power.

Almighty God, Help me and all my brothers so to order our days that whether many or few they may all be thine, and that whatever we undertake in this new year for the glory of thy name may be crowned with thy blessing, for Jesus' sake. Amen! E. B. B.

The Horse-leech of the Navy

Secretary Myer, of the navy department, like the horse-leech, is never satisfied and is constantly crying, "More, more!" In his recent annual report, he claims that the United States will fall from the second to the fourth place in the relative standing of naval powers if it does not change from its present policy of providing for only two battleships a year. He urges congress to appropriate enough money for three battleships of the dreadnaught class, two battleship cruisers, sixteen destroyers, six submarines, two gunboats, and a fleet of auxiliaries to include transports, supply ships, tugs, tenders, and a dry-dock. The navy general board recommends four battleships, and it is pointed out in the report that even this number would mean no real increase in the navy as four ships, having reached the twenty-year period, are about to be retired. Secretary Myer also calls attention to the inadequacy of the $140,000 spent by our nation last year for aëroplane equipment, compared with the European nations which spent individual sums ranging from $2,000,000 to $6,000,000, the latter being the expenditure of France. The present strength of the navy is about thirty-three capital ships—battleships and battle cruisers—which should be increased to forty-one, if our commercial activities and our coastline are to be properly protected. It is perfectly true, as Secretary Myer points out, that international peace is no nearer, so far as limitation of armaments is concerned. But that fact in and of itself is no longer an argument for increasing the burden of naval appropriation for our nation—a burden under which the common people of Europe are almost crushed. The carrying of concealed weapons in many states is prohibited by law for very excellent reasons which inhere in human nature. Wherever this law is commonly ignored, shooting affrays are always imminent. Only last week, in a southern state, even a minister was involved in such an affair with the result that he comes out of it with the brand of Cain. An individual carries a weapon concealed and in defiance of the law of the land, but the nations of the world are still in the cow-boy stage and are practically well-filled arsenals. Moreover, militarism as a profession is constantly tempted to unleash the dogs of war. An army officer without the slightest prospect of ever having the chance to try out his military theories in real war is like a briefless lawyer, a physician whose pills never leave his laboratory, or an editor whose paper nobody reads. International peace will never become a reality until armaments can be reduced. Some nation must lead the way. The European situation is so complicated that it can hardly be expected from that quarter. Our freedom from continental alliances, our geographical isolation making invasion practically out of the question, our ever-growing friendship with Great Britain, these and other reasons make it possible for the United States to set an example, as yet impossible for other countries, in the reduction of armaments. The Christmas message of peace must ever be something of a mockery so long as Christian nations persist in policies which inevitably lead to the opposite of peace.

Fair Play at Salem

"Not guilty." This is the verdict of Massachusetts justice on the question as to how far labor leaders can be held responsible for acts of violence committed in the midst of a strike. After ten months in jail—a length of time for which the attorneys and leaders of the I. W. W. are responsible—and a trial lasting fifty-eight days, Ettor, Giovannitti and Caruso left the courtroom free men. Public opinion in Massachusetts, in spite of some strong tendencies in the opposite direction, has been slowly setting in more favorably toward the defendants. It has been generally thought that the commonwealth made a serious error in getting full capital indictments against Ettor and Giovannitti, neither of whom was present at the murder. That this was simply a piece of anti-strike tactics was the belief not only of the mill-operatives, but of ministers, newspaper men, lawyers and students of public affairs who have followed the proceedings. The most important effect of the trial will be to restore, at least in a measure, the confidence of the foreign-born mill-workers in the administration of law and justice in Massachusetts. The latter had felt—and perhaps justly, from the point of view of the maintenance of order and public safety—the clubs of the police and the bayonets of the militia. They had witnessed the unnecessary arrest of young working girls at the midnight hour. They had seen parents debarred from sending their own children out of the city, a serious infringement of personal liberty. They had looked on while the courts of the native-born had let off Breen with a light fine, who had been convicted of planting dynamite to discredit the strikers, while a score of foreign-born rioters were given a year in the house of correction. Is it any wonder that the fear was widespread lest the injustice of the witchcraft cases in the old Salem of 200 years ago should be repeated in the court-room of the new Salem of the twentieth century? Although Ettor's sympathy with the anarchist wing of the industrial unionists was clearly brought out during the trial, the defense produced ministers, whose veracity was admitted by the prosecution, who testified as to the innocent character of Ettor's utterances. Contrary to the advice of their counsel, Ettor and Giovannitti made the most dramatic plea for freedom or for death ever heard in a Massachusetts court-room. Great as was Ettor's speech, it was surpassed by that of Arthur Giovannitti. His peroration was a climax of poetic and oratorical art, which brought tears to the eyes of even the reporters. "And if it be," he said, "that these hearts of ours must be stilled on the same death chair and by the same current of fire that has destroyed the life of the wife-murderer and the patricide and parricide, then I say that tomorrow we shall go from your presence into a presence where history shall give its last word to us." It is surely the duty of every Christian, whether he may agree or be totally at variance with the views of these men, at least to understand their views and to remember that this is a time when patience, sympathy and love are greatly needed, if class distinctions and hatreds are to be avoided.

Ferreting Out Fiscal Freaks

It seems to be the general feeling that most of the big financial interests of the nation are "headed up" in a so-called money trust, which is not indeed an actual organization, but a sort of gentleman's agreement more or less intangible, but none the less real. The banking and currency committee of the house of representatives, of which Samuel Untermyer is the counsel, has resumed its investigations, and bankers and brokers from many cities have testified. One of the things Mr. Untermyer has endeavored to bring out is that there has been a general movement among clearing-houses throughout the country to impose on banks a rule enforcing collection of commissions on out-of-town checks collected by banks. It was proved, for example, that the Baltimore clearing-house has declined to admit the State Bank of Maryland to a clearing-house membership because it could not be forced to make a charge for such collections. Pittsburgh bankers seem to have combined with the clearing-houses of certain Ohio cities for the collection of commission on out of town checks, and two banks in the former city are seeking an injunction to prevent the working-out of this combination. It was freely admitted that the collection of out-of-town checks without charge was not an embarrassment financially. It was also acknowledged that a bank suspended from the clearing-house could not "clear" through any other clearing-house bank. One of the witnesses frankly said that such a bank could only carry on a general banking business under a serious handicap. Mr. Untermyer endeavored to show that such a handicap as this would practically put a bank out of business. Human nature does not seem to differ very much wherever it happens to be found or with whatever occupation it happens to be connected, whether it is banking or taking summer boarders. This investigation will be more than worth while if it does nothing more than to make plain to the average man what has before been known only to a comparatively few students. The tendency toward concentration and monopoly is so strong that the only remedy lies in a sound and radical revision of the entire banking and currency system.

—The famous Albi Glass Works in France, owned and run by the work-people themselves, are, foreign dispatches allege, the scene of a strike.

—New York is still cleaning house. The former city chamberlain and former law partner and protegé of the mayor of the city, has just been convicted of bribery. At the same time, the men higher up have not yet been reached.

—Corn-growing clubs are being organized by the superintendents and school teachers in the various countries of Virginia. Each boy was given a measured acre and received instruction from an agent of the agricultural department. Five thousand boys entered the contest last year.

The New Year—What Shall I Attempt?

We are going to attempt something. Disciples of Jesus believe they can bring things to pass. The Lord has brought them into fellowship with himself in order that they may share his power and achievements. When one sits down and begins to complain that the world is going to the dogs at a rapid pace, and that nothing can be done to arrest its progress, he ceases to be a disciple of Jesus, if he ever was one.

In the report of the Men and Religion Movement we read, "At the present hour the world is blessed by widespread discontent." For centuries prophetic souls have cried out against indifference. They have known that a world that did not rebel against evil conditions could not be helped. Now they are seeing of the travail of their souls and they ought to rejoice. The disinherited are demanding their rights.

From the same report we also read: "We are to spiritualize this discontent." This does not mean that we are to preach a gospel of future blessedness to the exclusion of present satisfactions. It does mean that we are to help men to see how they can dwell together on the face of the earth and rejoice in each other's welfare. It means that the spiritual values that have been known to a part of the people shall be made known to all.

"To be influential and powerful in these days of social reform the Church must know the facts. Accurate information is a necessity of the pulpit." Accurate information is also necessary for the pew. Why should any one think the minister should be the only man in the church who can speak with intelligence on the mission of the church? Thousands of men who sit in the pews are studying with care the present situation and they have their contribution to make to the power and influence of the church.

There is much poverty in the world. There is wretchedness due to poverty in all our cities and in country places. Why are there so many poor souls? Whose fault is it? Are all needy persons lazy? Have they been robbed? Is society so organized that some get more than their share of the world's good and others are kept from getting what they earn? These are old questions, but they should receive better answers than many of us are able at the present to give. They should be studied in the Sunday-school and the conclusions to be reached should not be set down by a group of ecclesiastics. We should study with the open mind and decide according to the facts.

The recent meeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America reminds us that there is discontent with present religious organizations. There is a feeling that the Protestant bodies of America can have a closer fellowship in social service, in home missions, in foreign missions, and in education. Every one of us that intends to meet his obligations squarely should inform himself concerning the religious organizations of America and of the world. We can all profit by a fresh study of the teachings, the methods and the spirit of the Protestant churches. Here again, we ought not to allow anybody to tell us beforehand what conclusions we shall reach. Our aim should be to discover what is being done to Christianize the world.

A bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church put these questions to a company of religious leaders in the city of Chicago: "Can any one church win Chicago for Christ?" "Can all the churches working separately save the city?" "Can all the churches working together do what is required?" Any one who knows our great cities will answer the first question in the negative. The work of even the most powerful religious organizations is pitifully small. It cannot command sufficient resources of men and money for the task. And the churches working separately cannot do the work. Great establishments are needed for the manifestation of the spirit of Christ to the multitudes in the cities. The Christian people must face this situation honestly and discover some method of coöperation that will make effective the work of all the churches. While we are defending our beliefs by logic, our failure in the cities is discrediting the church. We must deal with present issues.

About the worst failure is that of the man who will not attempt anything unless conditions are exactly right. He will not work in any church because there are too many churches. There is corruption in politics, hence he keeps away from the voting place. The world has in it much evil, therefore he will do nothing to put away the evil. This kind of man sometimes talks of ideals and when he does he is not worth hearing. The man who is worthy of notice is doing the best he can. He is not waiting for the world to set itself right so that he can do great deeds. [Midweek Service, Jan. 1. Eccl. 9:10; Matt. 5:16; Luke 2:49; John 9:4.]

Keeping in the Middle of the Road

The crowd will always move along the middle of the King's highway. Not many mortals have either the desire or the courage to walk alone; we like to lean on each other's strength, and to be numbered with the safe and sane. No compliment just now has more unction among the Disciples than to be called safe and sane. We are trying to find our bearings in the midst of storms, and to determine where the middle of the road is, if we may revert to the figure of dry land. It seems to many to be unwise to leave the accepted way in the interest of a little pioneering in spiritual realms, such as David Livingstone did for Africa. We are fearful that our Livingstones may disappear in the darkness; and the lovers of the established order counsel caution in view of that risk, while the bold cheerfully assume the risk in hope of the treasures which await the successful. It is the wisdom of fatherly care which bids us beware of the by-paths leading to the unknown and the untried; it is the wisdom of the sage which declares that out of the unknown and the untried has grown the glory of the world. A Columbus must brave the terrors of every uncharted sea.

Assuming that the middle of the road is where all should plant their feet, it is certain that some fool in his generation, and a saint or a philosopher according to the canonization or verdict of the generation succeeding, will leave that open road in the hope of discovering some daisied path to relieve the wearied sight of his fellow-pilgrims on the march, or a doctrinal herb that will drive death from the pot wherein our pabulum has been simmering as we rested by the way, or some heart's-ease that will lessen the soreness of the journey. While he is engaged in the search we will do our best to make him wish he had never been born, and were we as cruel as our fathers we would set him on fire to the glory of God; but as we are better than they, we will wish him God-speed in his labors, covering his sins by the mantle of our reflection that he has an ancestral whimsey in the brain.

Not every one who leaves this open road succeeds in his quest; he may do many foolish things, and make grievous mistakes; but deeply written in the heart of man is the conviction that some one will succeed, and a Luther braves the risk. He will be called mad in his day, but later generations will revise the wisdom of their fathers, and for madness write genius, hero, or saint; and gratitude will write high his name where the darkness can never fall upon it.

It will hardly be affirmed that Isaiah, Jesus or Paul moved within the lines of that procession which held its way serenely in the middle of the road; the reformers lived their lives apart, were forced out of a regularity which they would gladly have maintained if they could, and were left by the roadside to the mercy of conventional stabilities. And while we agree that the mass must ordinarily hold together, we must not forget that men possessing genius or inspiration have divided the host, and will continue to divide it, often compelling the ranks to desert the old paths for new, as truly as Jesus compelled the age in which he lived to forsake Moses for him.

Preachers who live their middle-of-the-road lives are likely to be popular, but no one has less patience with the middle-of-the-road politician than has the preacher. He regards such opportunist politician with contempt. But the latter is merely trying to move along the line of least resistance.

Religiously speaking, our doctrine has in it the perilous implication that crowds are infallible, and peace-loving, and established for all time to come in their views. It implies that "one may hold whatever heresy he pleases if he will only hold his tongue." It seems to say that in silence there is safety, that heresy is harmless, if hidden, and that there are no snares on the open road. From all of which every observing and earnest soul boldly dissents.

No martyrs have ever been found in the middle of the road, but, of course, martyrdom is a thing of the past; no martyr-blood beats in our veins. We are content to pay that noble army of the distant past the honor of saying that their blood was the seed of the church, decrying heresy meanwhile, and forgetting that nearly all the martyrs were heretics. The ink of the scholar has taken the place of the blood of the martyr, and is our hope for the church.

Yet if we were all sure where the middle of the road was we might walk in it, for then the perverse would cease from troubling and the wearied church be at rest; but this is precisely what we do not know, and cannot know with certainty. All we can know is that each man must find his own road, maintaining his own center of gravity, following the light of truth and duty. He may walk with the crowd or he may walk alone; in a secluded or in an open way.

Honest men will do their duty as God gives them to see their duty, and the path will become the path of the just which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. It matters little whether it be hedged with thorns or roses, so long as one walks in it without putting a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in a brother's way. The essential thing is that each of us shall find his highway, and move down it in gladness and fidelity, always in the fear of God, and never in the fear of man.

Where Will This End?

The dangers of too close association with the "Chicago coterie" have many times been solemnly pointed out by the Christian Standard, but this month of December, 1912, affords the most significant illustration of this danger that has come to light in many years. The editor of the Standard before leaving Cincinnati for the Federal Council in Chicago wrote an editorial saying that he had been appointed a delegate to represent the Disciples in the Quadrennial gathering and that he was going, but not as a delegate. He was simply going to hang around the Council some, and take notes, and report the affair to the faithful who read the Christian Standard.

The next week there appeared an editorial reporting the Council gatherings in most sympathetic fashion, The editor confessed that he had not only attended but had worn the badge and exercised the prerogatives of a delegate. The article exhibited a complete flop in the Standard's attitude toward the Federation movement. Rejoicing in this Chicago newspaper office knew no bounds. Mr. Lappin had been in Chicago for a week and had caught the microbe of "liberalism!" From whom did he get it? we wondered.

Being absent from the city that week we had no observations upon which to base a diagnosis. But here comes the Christian Evangelist and says that Mr. Lappin and E. S. Ames were seen much together, so much indeed that it caused jocular comment among the brethren.

Little did they know what was happening! It was no jocular matter. It was a mighty solemn process. Ames was inoculating Lappin with the Chicago microbe! And since then the editor has broken out with the Federation disease.

Let no one be surprised now if he should, at any time, break out with those well known and havoc-working diseases which the "Chicago coterie" spreads every where any of their representatives go—the blighting evolution! the awful higher criticism! or the dreadful affection of receiving-all-members-of-Christ's-Church-into-your-church-without-discrimination-against-any!

Think of it! Ames, above all Chicago men! Why it wouldn't surprise us one bit if the Standard came down with one of those "ideals" with which Guy Sarvis is infected and which he is spreading all over China. He is said to have gotten them originally from this same Ames!

Charges Which Cannot Longer Be Ignored

The Christian Standard plainly charges that the alleged "dividend" of $10,000 which the Christian Board of Publication recently "declared" and appropriated to various missionary societies is not an actual dividend but a sheer gift made from the residue of the large sum of money which R. A. Long has contributed to the St. Louis institution. It intimates clearly that the motive for making such a gift in the form of a dividend is to cultivate the favor of the organizations benefited by it and especially to put the Sunday-schools under a sense of obligation to purchase supplies from that Board. The Standard does not believe that the business of its competitor has increased suddenly to a profit earning basis after having declared a deficit of over $40,000 in one year and over $50,000 in another year of the three years of its present management. These every clear-headed business man will recognize as very serious charges. The Standard has demanded again and again that the Board of Publication make a statement of its affairs to the brotherhood. It now suggests that the thirteen men whose names appear as directors cannot possibly possess actual authority or they would have insisted long since upon an accounting being made to the Disciple public and, if no actual profits had been earned, would not have tolerated a deceptive declaration of dividends.

The course of the St. Louis house is the occasion of chagrin to a multitude of Disciples. By whatever methods Mr. Long became a millionaire lumber magnate or Mr. Smither may have secured his reported control of the milk supply of a western city, Christian leaders like Dr. Peter Ainslie and Dr. Charles S. Medbury cannot afford to stand in the eyes of their brethren as sponsors for or backers of a policy of bribe-giving to the Sunday-schools in order to secure their patronage.

This is precisely what the Christian Standard's charges mean. Whether they are true or false The Christian Century has no means of knowing. But if they are false the channel by which they can be shown to be false is accessible and always open.

The Billboard Nuisance

France is determined to tax offending billboards out of existence. The vast number of enormous billboards along railroads and automobile routes has stimulated France to drastic action. Every advertisement board a meter square (a meter is thirty-nine inches) will have to pay a tax of $10. On a sign five meters long and two high, the tax will be $100 a year, and on some existing signs the tax would come as high as $1,200 or even $1,500. It is readily seen that such a tax will prove prohibitory, as is its design. The billboard nuisance, great as it is in America, is even worse in Europe, and Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, Denmark and Holland are modeling legislation after the French law on the subject. The medley of small poster advertisements seen at their worst in the railroad stations of many European countries is almost as offensive as the mammoth billboards in the country districts. Both are equally contrary to good taste and to civic morality.—Leslie's.

—The Christian Century is not under the delusion that the triumph of its contention against the legalistic dogma of immersion will be so easy as might be inferred from the fact that the Christian Evangelist seems to be our latest convert. The editorial in which that paper affirms that immersion is the "form" of baptism, places it, of course, in the progressive and anti-legalistic side of the question and opposed to the teaching of Alexander Campbell. But the whole article betrays such looseness of mental process on the editor's part that there is scant hope he saw the significance of his words when he set them down. This was probably the editor's first essay in the field of polemical writing on the perennial subject of baptism. Now that you are in, Bro. Smither, stay in and let us talk it out!

—This is the way the gospel is preached in Savannah: "Pastor John S. Wilder will deliver two special sermons at the church, Thirty-fifth and Barnard streets, today. 'The Deep Thoughts of God' will be the subject this morning. To-night he will use an unusual subject, 'Rag-time Religion, or Those Much-Abused Twins.' Pastor Wilder in this sermon expects to put forth some interesting facts. The congregations on Sunday nights pack the church and many cannot get in owing to lack of accommodation. The public is invited to be present and hear these subjects discussed, and no doubt there will be a large congregation present to hear him."

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly

The Shrines of Japan

If one were to ask a Japanese of the old regime what are the religions of his country, he would reply that there are three—Shinto, Buddhism and and Confucianism. If the question were asked of an up-to-date native, he would no doubt say that the prevailing faiths are Shinto, Buddhism and Christianity. For though Christianity has only a small place as yet in the recognized religious life of the nation, it has at last obtained sufficient foothold to be taken seriously by even the authorities. Last year a conference was called by the government to receive from the highest sources an expression of opinion regarding the importance of ethico-religious matters in the empire. The call was issued by the Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, and included invitations to the representatives of the Shinto, Buddhist and Christian groups. The Roman Catholics refused to answer or attend, but the Greek Catholics and the Protestants regarded the invitation as a distinct and notable recognition of the Christian faith, and were present.

But Shinto, in spite of imperial sanction and the effort to secure something like observance of its principles on the part of the people, is a dying system. It is a compound of animism, nature worship and ancestor worship. It invests localities with significance as the dwelling-places of good or evil spirits; it has a set of myths which atempt to account for the phenomena of nature and the origin of the nation; and it prescribes obedience to parents, and particularly to the ruler, on the ground that these superior beings become gods at death, whose worship is essential to the welfare of the individual and the community. For this reason the shrines to which the followers of Shinto ("The Way of the Gods") resort are usually the tombs of the great men of the nation, the Shoguns, the Mikados, or the heroes of Japan.

Both Show Places and Shrines.

Because such men would naturally choose the most beautiful spots in which to be buried, most of the places which have been most blessed by nature with the loveliness which Japan so abundantly boasts, are both show places and shrines. To them must of course be added the mountain peaks, most of which are associated with some god or saint, and over all is the white summit of Fugi-yama, the beautiful and sacred mountain, which forms the central theme of the poets and the leading motive of the artists of the nation.

But in a special degree some localities have attained importance both for sanctity and loveliness. Of these easily the first is Nikko. It is situated some five hours north of Tokio by express train, and could hardly be surpassed for beauty. From the station one follows a long street bordered by tall cryptomeria trees, up through a little Eta village whose people are regarded as pariahs by most Japanese, and whose business is in the gathering and selling of furs; on up through the town, whose attractive shops are a constant temptation to the buyer of curios. Then one comes to the river, across which are stretched the two bridges, the one for ordinary humanity, and the others sacred to the memory of the saint, Shodo Shonin, whose miraculous passage of the flood, and vigils on the summit of Nantai-zan, the tall mountain near Nikko, have made mountain and river and town alike sacred. The celebrated "Red Bridge," another prominent motive in Japanese art, was only crossed by the Shoguns, save twice a year when pilgrims are permitted to cross it.

The Mausolea of the Shoguns.

Then after an abrupt turn to the left, one follows the course of the river along the valley, whose steep sides are a wonder of vines and flowers, and along whose crests are built gardens and shrines in profusion. For here on the right are the famous mausolea of the Shoguns, those famous men who usurped the power of government from the hands of the weak and consenting Mikados, and from the twelfth to the nineteenth century were the virtual rulers of Japan. Only two of these warriors are buried here, Ieyasu, the founder of the Tokagawa Shogunate (d. 1616) and his grandson, Iemitus (d. 1651). The rest are buried in Tokio, some in Shiba Park, and some in Uyeno.

It was after dark when we reached Nikko, and we found the jinrikisha men from the hotel waiting for us. The street was but dimly lighted, like most streets in Japan, outside of the busiest sections of the largest cities. The municipality itself does nothing toward the lighting of the streets, but some towns require the citizens to hang out lanterns along the more frequented ways. Many if not most of these lights are the familiar Japanese paper lanterns, on which are usually painted the names or devices of the tradesmen within. Our 'rikisha men each had such a lantern with the name "Nikko Hotel" printed upon it.

We started in procession up the long street, and nothing could be more picturesque than the row of bobbing lights as the men trotted along. As the way was mostly up hill, there was another set of men who pushed. We went up through the cryptomeria avenue, through the little fur village, through the town and across the bridge, and then turned along the bank of the rushing stream for a full half mile, till a sudden curve to the right and up another incline brought us to the hotel.

Temple and Tomb of Ieyasu.

Of course the chief object of interest in the town is the temple and tomb of the great Ieyasu. He is to be ranked with Yoritomo and Hideyoshi as of the very first rank in the ancient annals of the land. To visit the temple erected to his honor and worship his spirit is an act of piety, and to stand at his tomb still further up the hill confers a certain merit on the pilgrim.

You climb some stairs between the tall sacred trees, and come to the huge granite entrance of torii, such as is found before all temples, whether Shinto or Buddhist. It consists of two uprights, connected near the top by a cross bar, while over the two, and projecting on either side is a second bar. In the pure Shinto temples this upper bar is quite straight, but in the ryobo or later form of Shinto the projecting ends turn slightly upward. In the Buddhist gateway the roof is much more elaborate.

The real entrance to the temple inclosure is called the Gate of the Two Kings. These are fearsome looking images, which keep guard at the gates of temples to scare away evil spirits. Just outside this gate there is a beautiful five-story pagoda, elaborately painted, and in the court within the gate are many structures sacred to the memory of the great hero, or containing relics of his time. Over the door of one of the buildings, all of which are rich with carvings, there is the well-known group of three monkeys, who cover eyes, ears and mouth respectively, in token that they will neither see, hear, nor speak evil.

Climax of Religious Art.

It is only by entering the third court, each more ornate and elaborate than the one before, that one reaches at last the shrine. This is divided into an outer and an inner section, the former an apartment of wonderful richness, the climax, as it would seem of religious art. The carvings of birds, beasts and flowers are of astonishing fineness, and heavy with gold and lacquer. But even this is not to be compared with the inner chamber, or holy of holies, to enter which a special service must be performed, and into which few probably penetrate. When all is in readiness you are ushered in, clothed in suitable temple garments, and with unshod feet; and in the darkness, lighted only dimly by the lanterns held by the two priests who accompany you, there are revealed the very finest achievements which religious art has produced in Japan. Here are three little chambers, each a perfect gem of carving, metal work and painting, the motives or subjects being taken from the national traditions or mythology. Whatever one may have thought of Japanese art before, he is here compelled to confess that not even Fra Angelica wrought more exquisite faces than look out from these walls.

But even yet the tomb is not reached. One must pass out through a side gate and up a flight of some two hundred steps to the spot where, in a bronze, pagoda-shaped case the bones of the hero rest. To this place thousands upon thousands of people come every year. Groups of students, boys and girls in bands of fifty or a hundred, led by their teachers, men and women of all classes, and old people who have waited a lifetime in the hope of winning merit at last by a visit to the shrine—all come, climb the many steps to the temple and the tomb, walk up the long eight-mile road to Lake Chuzenji with its sacred spots, its leaping cateract of Kegon, and its visions of the holy mountain of Nantai-zan, and then go home, pausing a moment longer at the sacred Red Bridge, and feel that one of the great objects of life has been achieved.

A Land of Shrines But No Religion.

I have taken time to describe this shrine of Ieyasu at some length, first, because it is one of the finest if not the very chief of all, and second, because there are thousands of others all over Japan, which though humbler in structure and less significant in their associations, have the same general form, and are, at least locally, of prime importance. One must of course visit Kamakura, where the temple of the war-god Hachimon stands, and see at the other end of the once famous town the great Diabutsu, the sitting figure of Amida, usually called the Bronze Buddha. That calm, colossal image of the untroubled and meditative life has its message of an unstriving and contented religion.

There is Nara, another sacred town, on the way to which one passes the little village of Momoyama, so much loved by the late Mikado, and now his burial place. This too will be a shrine because of this fact, and already the railroad is burdened to take care of the crowds that travel out to pay their worship to the dead. Nara has another Diabutsu, though not so beautiful as the one at Kamakura, and a temple where the sacred dances are given, and where thousands of stone lanterns line the approach and testify the zeal of the patrons of the place.

The Three Monkeys, Temple of Ieyasu, Nikko, Japan.

And so from the simplest Shinto or Buddhist shrine by the wayside up to the wonders of Nikko or the majesty of the holy mountain, Fugiyama, Japan is filled with shrines. And yet it is almost a land without a religion. And it must wait the day when Christianity shall come to its own among the people to realize what is the power of the divine life in the soul of man to transform character and to reach the highest good.

A Rich Woman

The third day at breakfast Eleanor announced her plan:

"I shall not be here to lunch, Madge. I'm going over to Betty's this morning."

Madge hesitated, plainly troubled. "I—forgive my saying it, Nell—but I wouldn't go to lunch. You don't know how poor Betty is. We've tried and tried, all the old crowd, to get her out, but we can't and we are sure it's because she hasn't clothes to wear."

"But she must have things to eat—something," Eleanor insisted, "and unless she has changed inconceivably, she will want to share it. I think I'll stay, unless, of course, I'm not invited. You can't persuade me that Betty Alden wouldn't be Betty Alden even if she lived in a single room."

Yet as the car entered the poor suburb, the half-words of the girls—Madge, Jessica, Constance—grew more and more insistent. What if, after all, they were right, and Betty really was changed? It would not be the first time that poverty had worn the sweetness and nobleness out of a life. Thirty-seven, thirty-five—Eleanor drew a sharp breath of relief. Tiny and poor as it was, thirty-three was plainly a home, saying happy things to the little cheap street.

She pulled the bell. Betty must have been near, for she opened the door at once; for a second she stared, incredulous; then, "Eleanor, you miracle!" and Eleanor found herself close in Betty's arms.

Then Betty drew Eleanor into the tiny parlor. A little blue-eyed girl had slipped into the room. Betty whirled upon her.

"Daughter, here's mother's dear friend, and she's going to stay and lunch with us. Isn't it lovely? For you are going to stay, you know," looking over her shoulder at Eleanor. "There's only bread and milk for the babies and eggs for you and me, but you don't care, and neither do I. We're all going to get it this minute, because Boy will be awake soon, and we want to be ready. Daughter," and she whispered something mysteriously.

Daughter trotted off, and returned presently with a handful of pansies. There were no stems to them. Betty laughed, and told Daughter to scatter them over the table while she herself was poaching the eggs.

Eleanor, looking at the pansy-strewn table with its plain dishes, had a sudden vision of the luncheons the "crowd" had been giving her. Then she looked at Betty, simply and joyously offering her best with no thought of apology.

"Well?" Madge asked when Eleanor returned, "Isn't it pitiful down at Betty's?"

"Pitiful?" Eleanor retorted. "Betty is the richest woman I know."—Exchange.

"Sing, Christmas bells!
Say to the earth this is the morn
Whereon our Saviour-King is born:
Sing to all men—the bond, the free,
The rich, the poor, the high, the low,
The little child that sports in glee,
The aged folk that tottering go—
Proclaim the morn
That Christ is born
That saveth them and saveth me!"

An Optimist Who Has His Reasons

By Willis A. Parker

EDITORS' NOTE: The New Year's season suggests to every thoughtful man or woman the question whether with time flying by so fast life does, after all, possess permanent values upon which the soul's faith and hope may safely be builded. Amongst the unthoughtful, those who do not ask questions, there is often found a type of optimism which is mere gladness, the expression of personal good fortune or of a naturally sunny temperament. When, however, life's darker facts have either been experienced or sensitively observed the question of the moral character of the world will not down. It must be grappled with by our wit and resolution. The philosopher should help us here. Professor Parker, of Pomona College, Calif., makes in this article a genuine contribution to the very real personal problem many of our readers are, no doubt, feeling at this time. He would be the last to say that optimism is to be gained by merely sitting down and reasoning about it. But that clear reasoning will open the way to an optimistic outlook and to optimistic conduct no one will doubt.

By optimism I mean an outlook that arises from a confidence of the fundamental worth of life, and the value of its treasures. Among these I may mention home, health, friends, fatherland, religious faith and vocation that makes one's life effective among his fellows. By reasonable optimism, I mean that my philosophy is not hopeful merely because of shallowness or sanguinity of temperament; nor because I am indifferent to the great amount of misery in evidence about me; nor because I am ignorant that the conditions of life in many lands are such as to render existence a doubtful boon to millions, such indeed as to have induced pessimism as the natural mood of perhaps the majority of mankind. I have often felt that my optimism is an achievement rather than a temperament. I am, I think, much more sensitive to sorrow and suffering than to their opposites of composure and felicity. And I am surely not unmoved by the moods, nor wholly unpersuaded by the reasonings of the great advocates of pessimism. I am sure that my decision in favor of the philosopher's calling was greatly influenced by reflection concerning the wisdom of retirement, silence, and non-participation in the affairs of men, due to their incapacity, ingratitude, and inhospitality to new forms of truth. And if this is true, pessimism must be said to have had share in making me a devotee of philosophy, and as a result, a moderate, or as I prefer to call myself, a reasonable optimist.

A reasonable optimist must have reasons for his optimism. Some of these reasons, I now undertake to state.

I

First among these reasons I may say, if the paradox is permitted, are those which reside within the Reason itself, and are to me, for purposes of my own life, as others find them for purposes of their own lives, personal in their nature. Whatever the meaning of life may be to others, it presents to me the aspect of a mystery insoluble, deepening under the scrutiny of closer and closer introspection. It has been said that the ignorant man alone, acknowledges no mysteries. Certain it is that only the unreflective person fails to realize the perplexity and the preciousness at once of actually living. The secret of life then, the fact that it is an enigma, a problem into which each new truth, feeling, friend, foe, enter as complicating factors, and so suspend the moment of solution by so much as they swell the main account of its magnitude, this is the first and deepest ground of my serious hopefulness, my reverent good cheer. To be charged with a mission so momentous to myself, as the direction of the process that makes me or mars me, that is the thrill of living. To live the life of reason is to be conscious first of just this fateful, fearful, serious, sobering, and for these tremendous reasons uplifting, inspiring and ennobling privilege, of exercising a measure of self-direction. Such self-direction warrants me in claiming the life I have as my life, the expression in fair measure of my own purpose.

II

A mystery hardly less baffling, and a privilege scarcely less precious than that of personal consciousness and individual self-direction is that sympathetic relation that links life to life. When I realize how other lives have impressed me, and graven their very selves on me, giving me their truth, their insight, their restraint, and I trust, also, some small measure of their power, I am at a loss to explain that marvel of transference. Yet coming as I have come out of an ignorant community, and from a family that had no confessed interest in educational matters, having been touched now and again by living souls who have laid on mine the urgency of the truth, I am persuaded concerning the possibility of awakening in other lives something of the life that dwells in me. The privilege then of being guardian, advisor, guide, philosopher, friend, exemplar to others, and of doing in small ways and for many persons something of what a few persons have done for me, the very possibility of so doing fills life with promise; the fact of having done so in a few cases means actual fulfillment.

III

Beyond the reach of my necessarily small influence, however, live the majority of my fellows, separated by distance, interests, ideals and purposes from the life that I call mine. Yet linked with mine by ties of common blood, passion for truth, love of their communities as I love mine, love for a common country, or love for another, their minds blend with mine to form a commonwealth of the spirit. Biological law has set the solitary in families. Economic law has set families in the community. Common blood, languages, and traditions have widened the community to the proportions of the state, while maintaining its unity, and developing morality as its internal bond. International law, founded upon intuitions of right, which culture and religion uncover in the minds of all men bind nations together in a compact that suffers violence now and then at the hands of armies, but which more and more stills clamor with the voice of peace. And so the mystery of my personal life is set in relations with other personalities equally precious to themselves —relations that widen to the inclusion of the last dweller in the remotest land beyond the sea.

"Now there are diversities of gifts but the same spirit." There are varieties of interpretation but a common vision. There are different religions, but one great transforming loyalty. I am an optimist because I believe in humanity, not as a mere nominalist, but as an idealist whose ideal is every day becoming a flesh and blood reality. The realm of mankind is becoming the kingdom of God.

IV.

But a reasonable optimist cannot overlook the contradictions which a moral world offers to the temper of his creed. Our life is aware of both the evils which men suffer and the sins that they do. And of these the one is often the cause or the consequence of the other. Poverty, disease, ignorance, vicious surroundings—these are the evils that hedge life about, and make sin to be almost inevitable for a portion of our race. While drunkenness, violence, riot, and vice—these actual sins are the procurers of the conditions that foster their repetition in an endless round.

Two curative measures are essential, social reform to remove the evils, and individual salvation for the transgressor. One of these, society can accomplish, by persistent and intelligent effort; the option of the other remains with the individual. But the voluntary choice of the good must result in the majority of cases according to our optimism, if the opportunity to choose it be given as the natural environment of human life. And the actual removal of many of the ills of life accomplished in the last one hundred years of European and American civilization is evidence that other existing evils can be removed if the will to remove them continues to find expression through the channels of popular government, as secured by the suffrages of a people educated in and guided by history.

V.

A reasonable optimism takes account of its opposite, a reasonable pessimism, and derives meaning largely from the contrast effect of the two in antithesis. One may say that optimism and pessimism are both justified by the world in any age. If our minds were so fashioned as to permit us to consider the evil alone, the picture would be black; if the good alone, all white. Actually, however, no picture is possible, that is either all black or all white. Color and background, or black and white must enter together to give meaning to a canvas. Whether optimism or pessimism shall be the conclusion depends either upon the preponderating quality in the picture, or upon the act of emphasis by the beholder. At almost any age of history, pessimism can be justified as finding a preponderating element of evil in the world picture. Considered statically, there is more evil than good; more sin than righteousness. Considered dynamically, however, the genius of goodness justifies optimism, if one so will to interpret his world, and to work with good forces for social amelioration.

A single illustration must be invoked to illuminate this point of view. Choosing the problem of our present day political life that may be broadly characterized as that which arises out of the unequal distribution of the profits of labor, let us face it in each of the two moods in question. What we actually see is the wide separation of two classes—the toiling millions who receive the lowest wage selfish ingenuity can devise, in view of the cost of living—and the privileged class who share the enormous profits of protected industry—strangers to toil dwelling amid unearned splendor. Statically considered, the evil predominates in the exact proportion to the number wrongfully denied their just amount of the product of their toil. Dynamically considered, however, both classes are moving steadily toward economic betterment, though at different rates of approach. Judging either class by its past, the result is on the side of satisfaction; judged each by the other however, the conditions are far from satisfying, from the viewpoint of justice—to say nothing of the law of kindness.

Yet the way of mankind through the ages is not unlike the zigzag path one must follow from the plain to the distant mountain top. Climbers of the hills of progress and self advantage, we have different rates of speed. Some long for the single splendid view from the summit, and rush beyond others. Some go leisurely, pausing at every outlook. Some climb lazily, indifferently; some move only because impelled by others behind. Some lie fallen across the path. At any one moment, inequality seems the major fact, if one survey the climbers from a distance. The few in the path above seem mockers of the tired or leisurely ones far behind. If one will to so interpret their superiority, he may. But one may regard them as only forerunners of the many. What the few have done, many may do; all will do except the fallen, the lazy, the indifferent. No optimism can overlook the misery and tragedy of individual ignorance, stupidity and sin.

The Pastoral Zoo

By William E. Barton

Some time ago an Episcopal rector in Delaware printed in his church paper a short article entitled "Pastoral Perplexities." His perplexities were zoological. He nardly knew how to classify his flock with reference to his duties as pastor. I had a letter some time ago asking if I had seen that article, and if so, whether I would either print or mail it. I did not have it then and have forgotten who it was who wanted it; but now it comes to my hand, and I will append it to this present article.

It is very interesting to note how men have claimed kinship with animals. They have not been content to pet them, but have made themselves blood relations. This fact lies at the basis of several important sciences, and has its bearing upon religion. We know, for instance, that the animal worship of Egypt was not wholly what we would call worship. The men who bowed down to bulls and cats and bugs did not merely worship the veritable bodies and souls of particular bulls and cats and bugs. but expressed in part their ense of kinship.

Totemism.

Totemism seems to have entered in some measure into many kinds of faith, and to have left survivals in various forms of sacrifice. The man who could redeem his own life by substituting a sheep, established in the act, or recognized a relation already existing by which there obtained some element of sympathy and possibly of kinship. This was not always so, for sacrifices were very various; but it was partly so.

The science of heraldry is a sort of middle-age totemism. The family that chose as its crest the head of a boar, or the rampant form of a lion, did, in its own way, what the Alaska Indian did in his when he erected the totem pole before his hut.

Nations do the same. The American eagle, the Russian bear, the British lion, the Freneb cock, are all more or less totemistic.

Political Menagerie.

In politics we always have a zoo. The Democratic donkey, the Republican elephant and the Prohibition camel are more or less stable figures. But beside these we have the more evanescent types, as the hound dog, and the bull moose.

Mascots represent a form of totemism. A college that will howl itself mad over a goat or a yellow dog is not so lacking in civilization as it seems. The boys have simply not outgrown their primitive worship of dumb beasts.

The article of which I spoke is not totemistic. The author is giving no academic address on the origins and relations of the species. He is merely telling about his zoo. And the zoo is so common in respectable circles, in heraldry, in art, in studies affected by the first families, in politics and even in religion, that there may just possibly be some readers who will be glad to read the following, which, I believe, appeared in the Delaware Churchman, though it comes to me typewritten, and not credited to anybody. I do not know the author; I only know that it was not I.

Pastoral Perplexities.

"I am shepherd of a little parochial flock. I have tended other flocks, both as under shepherd in a city and as ruling shepherd in a town; but never before have I known one containing so many heterogeneous elements as the one I have at present. Years ago I had lessons in pastoral care. No man ever undertook pastoral work with better theories of sheep-culture than I. In fact, in all ordinary dealings with sheep and goats, I believe I can do as well as the next man.

"I know their nature, their habits, their needs, and have learned to adapt myself to all conventional idiosyncrasies; I can do any thing that is according to rule. I have all the latest novelties of an institutional-fold, every organization intended to benefit the various members of a normal flock, a Little Lambs' Lullaby Library, a Young Rams' and He-Goats' Association, and Auxiliary for Aged Ewes, a Guild for Giddy Goats, a Ewe-Lambs' Friendly Society, a Butters' Brigade and a flourishing chapter of the Brotherhood of Belwethers. All this sort of thing I understand perfectly well. I have my sheep and goats classified and organized; and they all fit in well into the orderly system of my fold.

"But what puzzles me is to apply even the most approved principles of sheep-culture to the care of animals which are not sheep. For a long time I was distressed at my inability to deal successfully with some strange creatures I found in my fold, which were all legs and were always kicking. I tried every method known to the science of pastoral theology for dealing with erratic sheep or refractory goats; but my efforts led to no satisfactory result. My amazement at my inexplicable failure was quite as great as my sorrow. At last it dawned on my dazed mind that I was not dealing with sheep, but with kangaroos. Now what is a shepherd to do with the kangaroos of the flock? There is perplexity Number 1.

"Then again in my dealings with ewes, I have found creatures which spit and scratch in a most unewelike fashion. What is a shepherd to do with the cats of his flock? There is perplexity No. 2, more than doubly distressing than the other. A shepherd may be expected to manage sheep; but is it fair to expect that he can do equally well with cats, kangaroos, fowls of the air and creeping things? The pastoral virtues of a David count for little; a man needs the versatility of a Noah. I have been tempted to inerts a new clause in the Litany to the effect that my parish may be delivered "from all kickings of kangaroos and cantankerousness of cats," for how can a vestry composed of the one and a sewing society composed of the other continue to exist?

"What can be done about it? There they are in the fold, and I must deal with them. Is it possible to use their special qualities in some positive sort of way? Is the native impulsiveness of the kangaroos susceptible of right direction? Can the undeniable force of his constitutional Protestantism be utilized in agitations for true reform? Ideally considered, what is the ethical value of unlimbered hind-leg? After long and painful effort, I have seemed sometimes to find that kangaroos are really very effective in projects requiring rapid advance in several directions at once. The method of concentration by diffusion would not seem to promise great results; but it has its uses under peculiar circumstances, and circumstances very often are peculiar. I must, however, humbly own that I have never solved the cat problem, the promotion of felicitious felinity. I can see no possible use for cats in a sheep-fold, unless it be for the work of mutual extermination. They can be tolerated so long as any other species remain to be killed off. If they can be induced to confine their attention to each other, the peace-loving are spared. while they themselves receive appropriate punishment. At any rate, the problem, both ontologically and practically considered, seems tc defy all other efforts at solution.

"I often wonder whether my experience is unique; and whether I might not gain assistance from the suggestions of some brother-shepherd, or from the wise guidance of one of those over-shepherds who have oversight of many folds. If by chance this should meet the eye of any specialist trained in ecclesiastical zoos.I should welcome suggestions as to methods of promoting the non-survival of cats most given to fits!"

Cheer, O life, that is sad and dark!
Heal, O soul, that is torn and sore!
For the manager and the living God
Are loving and calling thee evermore.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT IN CHINA

Mrs. Carrie Chapman-Catt is one of the most distingunished women in the United States. She was the friend of Susan B. Anthony, and when that veteran suffragist decided to retire from office on account of her four score years, she chose Mrs. Catt as her successor in the presidency of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, and introduced her, after her election, as "an ideal leader." Her vigorous administration gave new life to the association, and helped to lay the foundation for the brilliant victories of the past few years.

A few years ago, she was promoted to the leadership of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance, and has just completed a two years' journey around the world in the interests of the enfranchisement of women. She has attended meetings and conventions, and investigated conditions among women in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Polynesia; she is a woman of splendid poise and culture, in the very zenith of her powers, and of a singularly calm and just judgment. Her statements, therefore, carry more than ordinary weight and authority with them. Her first utterance to the reporters when she landed in San Francisco, a month ago, was, "Votes for women the world over in the near future."

The next congress of the International Suffrage Alliance will be in Budapest in June, 1913, when representatives from this world-wide movement will be present.

The Woman Movement in China.

China was one of the last countries visited by Mrs. Catt, and while there she attended meetings of Woman Suffrage Associations in Canton, Shanghai, Nanking, and Peking. In Canton, the capital of the Kwantung Province, she found ten Chinese women members of the Provincial Parliament of one hundred and twenty persons. These had been chosen at an election in which both men and women voted. The first three things considered by this Parliament were foot-binding, the opium traffic, and the sale of little girl slaves for immoral purposes. In Shanghai, Nanking, and Peking, she found flourishing suffrage societies, with large membership, and received delightful courtesies at their hands. They had their own headquarters, and their object was to secure better social, educational, and political conditions for women. Of her reception in Peking, she says: "I have had many an optimistic vision about the emancipation of my sex from the world-wide trammels of tradition, but my wildest dreams never pictured a reception, given by suffragists in Peking, to representatives of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance. It took the form of a meeting, and an audience of one thousand men and women, attentive and sympathetic, were there to hear. The history which preceded this event is certainly the most unique, and I believe the most tragic in the world's movement."

Mrs. Catt has embodied the information she gained during her Chinese tour in a series of interesting articles in the Woman's Journal, and the following is a brief summary of the remarkable facts she relates:

The Tung Ming Hui.

About fifteen years ago, Dr. Sun Yat Sen, afterwards the first President of the Chinese Republic, organized a secret society in Tokio, Japan, called the Tung Ming Hui; its object was the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty, which had ruled over China for five hundred years, and the organization of a popular and democratic form of government by the Chinese people themselves. Women were urged to take an active part in the movement, and an article in the constitution of the society endorsed equal political rights for men and women in the new government. Chinese students in Tokio, women as well as men, were the first disciples of the new doctrine—in fact, it was primarily a student's movement. The Japanese capital was not only the recruiting station for members and workers, but the central point for the operation of the society.

Women Active Workers.

Those who undertook to propagate the revolutionary ideas of the society took their lives in their hands, for early in the history of the Tung Ming Hui its dangerous tendencies to the reigning dynasty were recognized. A price was set on the heads of the leaders, and Dr. Sun Yat Sen was forced to live abroad for a number of years. The women were no more deterred by the perils that threatened them than the men—they were not only forced by patriotism, but by the added hope of the emancipation of this sex. They gathered funds, solicited new members, organized new branches, and distributed literature; no one pleaded for the new China more eloquently and convincingly than some of the women orators.

When the time drew near for the outbreak of the revolution, the women in large numbers engaged in smuggling arms and ammunition from Japan into China. When messages, too dangerous for mail or telegraph were to be sent, women became the favorite carriers, and traveled all over China on such missions. But the Manchu government was on the alert, and many of the revolutionary agents were captured and put to death. Seventy-two "martyrs" of this kind were known—among them were a number of women.

Promises to the Women Broken.

The Chinese Revolution is too recent to rehearse here, even if we had the space. The new government decided to have Provincial Parliaments, with members elected by popular vote, and each Province was to determine the qualifications of its voters. When the election time came only the Canton Province was true to its pre-revolutionary promises and permitted an equal vote to men and women, and elected women members to its Parliament. The political leaders in all the other Provinces said the time was not yet ripe for woman suffrage, and they must be educated before they could vote; it is highly probable that in the Canton Provinces, the ballot will be taken from the women before the next election. It must not be forgotten that the women were perfectly willing to have the franchise with an educational qualification.

The Women are Desperate.

Mrs. Catt found the women with whom she came in contact in the suffrage societies of the great cities burning with indignation at the treachery of the political leaders. They are setting their faces like flint for a strong fight, and a long fight if necessary, for the redemption of pledges made to them. They are planning to organize in all the Provinces, and to ask for equal educational advantages for girls and boys, as well as equal political rights for women and men.

When we remember that they look backward on wrongs two thousand years old, on bound feet, uneducated brains, on marriage laws that condemn a women to slavery from birth to death—when we remember that the cruel system of concubinage, which cheapens and degrades them, is still in force, and that the President of the Republic himself has thirteen wives, or concubines, who will dare say that this revolt is not right, and that, soon or late, it must prevail?

The Passing of the Home

By Mrs. Frederick Perkins.

Jacob Riis says: "The children are ours tomorrow. As we mold them to-day so will they deal by us then. Unsafest of all is anything or any deed which strikes at the home."

The passing of the home. The very thought strikes terror to our hearts, and yet are we not face to face with this startling fact? Home is fast becoming a place in which to sleep and eat, and to do that as quickly as possible. Because of the small wages paid to the laborer, because of the high price of living, and because almost six nights in the week the whole family must attend picture shows; because of all this we find father, mother and the children as soon as possible in the mill, like their brothers working to "keep up with Lizzie."

A little girl just nine years old, but bright as a dollar, a child with wonderful possibilities, whose mother goes to the mill every morning at seven o'clock, pleads with tears in her eyes to be allowed to remain with her teacher after school, "'cause there's nobody at home, and I'll have ter play on streets till night," and then, saddest of all, this tired little elf is carried, as soon as the family swallow supper, to the picture show, and talks most eloquently next morning in her childish way of "some woman leaving her husband, 'cause the other man in the picture give her rings and fine clothes." The horror of it all that, at the age of nine, when her little mind should be stored with sweet, beautiful thoughts, this infidelity and shame are being portrayed and discussed so freely that it will be difficult to undo those early impressions and fill her mind with that great thought "that virtue is the brightest jewel in the crown of womanhood;" that rings, jewels, money, etc., do not bring contentment and happiness, but loving service to others and a forgetting of self in a desire to serve others, this is true contentment and happiness indeed. This child could be molded beautifully if mother and father realized that they were intended to be coworkers with God.

This is certainly a day of clubs, and as some one has said: "We need one more organization to stop the organization of any other organizations." The clubs are clubbing home life to death. Father belongs to a club (sometimes spelled saloon), mother belongs and children belong. Meals are eaten hurriedly and then there's a mad rush to see who can get away from home first. Some one has said: "If there were less bridge and more Bridget in the homes there'd be fewer divorces and more character." Let us as women know that home is the very cradle of character-building. Some women seem to think housekeeping is the prime essential of home. Some are so clean and neat they sweep their families into the street; it reminds one of the old lady who cleaned house and took her family off to visit in order to keep it clean. Give me the home with the loving atmosphere, even if there are greasy little finger prints on the windows and mud-stained marks of little feet. I'll take that any time if with it is a love for home and mother. Housekeeping, mothers, is for the day, but home-making is for eternity.

Not long ago a certain village wanted a curfew law, and an eccentric old bachelor said: "What yer need here is a curfew to ring the mothers to go home and put those tired children to bed." The remark caused some laughter among the men, but I believe that it made the angels weep. If it is not the will of God that one of these little ones should perish, surely we know that it is the will that we should train up these little ones in the way they shoud go and go that way ourselves.

A great many women think that woman suffrage will solve many problems, but I cannot see how it is to help arrest the passing of the home. It is like trying to purify the stream, when the real cause of impurity is at the source.

Born of woman as a babe, led by woman as a child, taught by woman as a boy, loved by woman as a man. He, the lawmaker, but she the man-maker. If the mother, the teacher, and the sweetheart are true women, true to the highest ideals of womanhood, our homes will be saved, manhood will be purer. This great truth should sink deep into the hearts of all—the morals of the nation will never rise higher than the morals of the women of that nation.—Christian Advocate.

Always Keep Faith

Many a woman who would not think of lightly breaking a promise made to a grown-up person is utterly careless about keeping her word with her children. She promises whatever is convenient at the moment, and apparently thinks that the breaking or keeping of those promises is a matter in which she can please herself, and that her children have no right to consider themselves aggrieved if she does not do so.

A mother who acts thus does her child grievous harm. She forgets that the sense of justice is strong in quite a little child, and that it is natural and reasonable that he should expect his parents to be as good as their word and to fulfil their promises even at the cost of convenience. Promises should not be lightly broken, and the parent who is guilty of this soon loses his children's confidence, which is one of the sweetest things which our little ones can give us. —Pictorial Review.

Women as Journalists

Opinion of Lord Northcliffe Who Employs Three Hundred of Them.

(From an address delivered before the Society of Women Journalists, London, and reported in the London Times).

Lord Northcliffe proposed the toast of "The Society of Women Journalists." He said:

I need no introduction to many of you, for women journalists and I have been associated—most happily associated—since my earliest Fleetstreet adventures. I have had no more loyal, no more sympathetic, no more courageous comrades than the women who have fought my fights with me.

Women as Journalists.

Let me express an opinion that there is an obvious main reason why women are ideal journalists. I am sure that I shall have the cordial agreement of every man present when I say that your powers of quick observation greatly excel ours. Then, though your sympathy with the poor and the suffering may not be greater than ours, it is certainly more often evoked, and we know that much of the great attention that is now being paid to the housing and general condition of the poor has been aroused largely by the pens of women—professional journalists and others.

There is a pertinacity, too, about the sex which enables them to achieve where men sometimes fail. Women interviewers, for example, are very rarely unsuccessful in their quests. I remember that when Li Hung Chang came to London he positively refused to be interviewed. He would see no man. Nevertheless we published an interview with him; it was done by a woman, perhaps a member of your society; and it was a very good interview, too. Here, therefore, are a few reasons for your success. Journalism is an ideal profession for women because it is not necessarily one of the tedious forms of toil demanding long hours away from home. Thus it is that the woman journalist, as I have found her, is as feminine and domestic in private life as she is effective in her work.

The Limitations of the Woman Journalist.

She has her limitations. Even our sex has some. I can remember, for example, being so unwise as to venture a considerable fortune in the endeavor to establish for women readers a newspaper mainly organized by women journalists. It was, perhaps, the worse of my many failures. There were many hidden reasons why it did not succeed. One of them was that ladies are not fond of taking orders from other ladies. Another is that their dispositions and ambitions frequently induce them to attempt tasks beyond their powers. Many here are aware that there is one great critical hour every night in every newspaper office in the world. It is the time when the day's results of the work of brain and telegraph are gathered together in the form of long columns of type that have to be marshalled into the shape of pages. The task demands cool judgment and quick decision—it is a fight for accuracy against time. At a dozen points the special newspaper trains are waiting to take the journals to their readers. Now one of my mistakes in connection with that newspaper was to allow a lady to "make up," as we call it in our Fleet street argot. I presume that I am not much of a judge of the sex, perhaps no man is. The lady I selected was of very determined appearance, and I was entirely misled by a neat black working costume that she wore, not at all a confection, and very much an overall. There was a grimness about the sleeves, and the whole appearance deceived me. Here, I thought, is a charming and attractive woman, and at the same time an extremely practical one. But I learned something about the sex on that fatal evening. As the easier columns of news came to hand the early pages all went well. When the rush began, from all sides came horrid printers, each with his column of type; this man with his Stock Exchange quotations, that with his Parliamentary sketch, another with the leading article, a fourth with the foreign telegrams. That prim but fascinating figure failed me. There came a demand from the publisher for newspapers that were not forthcoming. There were tears and other signs of feminine perturbation. And finally a dour Scottish foreman printer had to be brought on the scene to get some sort of paper away anyhow. As I have said, there are some things that ladies cannot do in journalism. There are limitations to your sex—and, of course, to ours.

Women's Influence on the Press.

I am going to ask you to bear with me a little while I express my opinion as to the changes—little realized, I think—that women have produced in journalism, and why. I speak not without some experience, because more than 300 ladies are engaged, directly or indirectly, in the active production of my newspapers and magazines. The situation today is that if women's work were suddenly removed from the newspapers and kindred publications, the recent giant growth of such reading, not only here, but in the United States and the Dominions, would revert very much to its original position as I remember it in the days before the woman worker had come to our help. In other words, the output would be reduced by 50 or 60 per cent.

To come to the more local question of the personnel of the newspaper world, woman's influence in Fleetstreet has been a good one. The old Bohemianism which I remember was much more attractive in retrospect than in actuality; it read very well in books, but it was a horrid thing to see. It has gone, perhaps owing somewhat to changing times, but not a little, I think, to feminine influence. And the newspaper itself, how different! Distance may lend enchantment to the recollection of newspapers, but his Majesty's Government has an awkward provision prescribing the preservation of newspapers. I have compared with amazement the old and the new, and am proud of the clean and independent Press of today. To the woman reader who has been created by the woman writer I attribute not a little of the elimination of crime, indecency, puffery, and mournful accounts of the last meals of the condemned which adorned the leading morn ing papers until very, very recently, as I can easily prove or you could see for yourselves. But perhaps old newspapers, like old love letters, are best left unread, so I will thank you for your patience and ask you to join with me in wishing the health of this delightful society, and equal opportunity and equal remuneration for men and women in the field of journalism.

Mrs. Thomson-Price responded on behalf of the society. She said it would be difficult now to produce a newspaper without the help of a woman, and she doubted whether there was a newspaper in existence that had not women on its staff. So great was the change in the position of women on the Press that female journalists now wrote on politics, science, and art; while the cookery and fashion columns were relegated to the young male.

—The American Issue says, "It is safe to predict that no party in Tennessee will ever again write a liquor plank in its platform. A safe majority of both branches of the legislature is pledged to the retention of the anti-liquor laws and is overwhelming anti-Patterson. We are hopeful of an advanced legislation for more effectieve law enforcement." Governor B. W. Hooper, Republican, was re-elected by a majority of from 8,000 to 10,000 over Benton McMillan, who had served two terms as governor. McMillan was nominated by the so-called regular Democrats and was placed on a platform declaring for the repeal of the statewide prohibition laws and was backed by the liquor interests in and out of the state.

—"There is too much 30-cent Christianity nowadays," says J. Campbell white of New York, founder of the laymen's missionary movement, basing his assertion upon the fact that the average amount given by the church member of the day recently has been computed as 30 cents a week.

Pontiac, Ill., church increased the salary of pastor, B. W. Tate, $200 at the beginning of his third year recently.

A new house of worship costing $12,000 is being erected at Vernon, Tex., and will, it is expected, be ready for dedication in February.

George L. Snively, has officiated at twenty dedication money raisings in 1912 and reports a total of $190,000 secured as a result of his leadership.

Mrs. W. J. Lhamon, wife of the Dean of the Bible School at Drury College, Springfield, Mo., delivered the C. W. B. M. day address at First Church, Joplin, Mo., Dec. 15.

C. C. Rowlison, pastor at Iowa City, Ia., has been invited by the rector to preach in the Episcopal church of that city on Christmas morning. This is an unusual courtesy to be extended by a church of this denomination and indicates the broadening of views and feelings which the Episcopal church is expressing in many communities.

Valparaiso, Ind., church has just completed a new $5,000 parsonage and the "parson" Claude E. Hill, with his family, has moved in. This great church will have Dr. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., for an evangelistic meeting in February.

South Broadway Church, Denver, sends out gilt engraved invitations to the fiftieth wedding anniversary of Doctor and Mrs. Benjamin B. Tyler on Christmas day. Things seem to keep on happening in the career of this preacher and his wife just as if he hadn't been preaching for more than fifty years.

The Disciples Christian Endeavor Board has prepared a program etitled "Christian Endeavor and Christian Citizenship" for use in the observance of Christian Endeavor day the first Sunday in February. These programs will be sent free of cost by Claude E. Hill, national superintendent, to those societies which will make an offering for the organized work.

In Houston, Texas, with a population of 105,000 people, 20,000 attended the Sunday picture shows and vaudevilles. The mayor indorsed a plan for a Sunday afternoon entertainment at the city auditorium, seating 7,000, and appointed as superintendent Rev. W. S. Lockhart, pastor of Central Church. The entertainments under Mr. Lockhart's direction have drawn large crowds.

213 CHURCH BUILDINGS ERECTED WITH OUR ANNUITY FUND

What It Is!

THE ANNUITY PLAN

How It Works!

In Our Church Extension Fund

at Kansas City, Mo.

What It Is—Through our Annuity Plan you can administer upon your own estate by putting your money into our Church Extension Fund. This is far better than making a bequest because the Board will pay you 6 per cent, in semi-annual payments, if you are fifty years old or more, and the interest will be paid to your wife if she survives you. Between the ages of forty and forty-nine the rate is 5 per cent, and 4 per cent between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine.

ITS GREAT ADVANTAGES TO YOU

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no trouble or losses in making reinvestments.
3. You have no taxes nor attorneys' fees to pay and your income is regular.
4. The Society is perpetual and is incorporated. Its funds are perpetual and are loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. Your money is safe because the Annuity Bond which the Board issues you is as good as a Government Bond because it is backed up by all the assets of the Fund, which now amount to over $1,015,276 and which will constantly increase.
6. We receive remittance of $100, or as many hundreds or thousands as you can send, and your money will be received at any time and the Bond will be dated so that your interest begins at once.

How Your Money Works—The Board does not invest your money in some secular enterprise and WAIT FOR YOU TO DIE before using it in the work of Church Extension. All of our Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to aid promising congregations to build. The money is returned by the churches using it in five equal, annual installments, and as fast as it returns it goes out again and again to build churches. Your money is thus in a PERPETUAL WHIRL OF DOING GOOD, because we have more demands for Annuity money than we can answer. Our mission churches in the new Southwest are glad to get Annuity money from the Board of Church Extension and pay 6 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more than is charged for the regular funds. They then have their loans in the hands of their friends.

Our Annuity Fund has received 355 gifts and $354,257.26, with which 213 church buildings have been erected.

We can use $100,000 this year. Send remittances at once and give your full legal name and your age. Write to ish religious life and thought to the Homiletic Review and the Christian Evangelist, is reported to have broken down nervously under ths strain of much mental labor. Mr. Durban has a multitude of friends among Disciples in this country and is the recogniged dean of our circles of leaders on the other side of the sea. Prayers many and sincere will ascend for his recovery.

The death, on Nov. 19, of W. C. Paine, a veteran minister, whose last days were made comfortable at the Jacksonville Christian Home for the Aged calls conspicuous attention to the quality of mercy dispensed by the National Benevolent Association. But for this institution this servant of God who died at the age of 93 years would have had no natural place to go. He had been in active service in the ministry many years having held pastorates in Iowa, Missouri and Illinois. He was associated with Alexander Campbell in his trip farthest west, which took the sage of Bethany to Ft. Madison, Mt. Pleasant and Burlington, Ia.

Dr. Charles S. Medbury, pastor of University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., scouted the idea that a big city is necessarily more dangerous to the character of youth than a a country town. He was speaking to a Keokuk audience. "I would rather raise a boy in the city of Des Moines," he said "than in a town of fifteen to eighteen hundred people. I find more profanity, a greater lack of morals in small country towns around the barber shops, depots, and livery stables than among the public places in the city." He said that in the city they are so busy that it is more difficult to let the mind wander to immoral things.

The diary kept by Secretary Stephen J. Corey on his visit to the Congo to inspect one of the most interesting mission fields in the world, has been published in a little book that is being sold by the Foreign Society of Cincinnati, for 50 cents. The book is entitled "Among Central African Tribes." Mr. Corey was an intelligent and sympathetic visitor. He had eyes to see, a mind to appreciate and literary ability to describe what he saw. In this diary he has succeeded in giving an accurate and intensely interesting account of the whole situation whose leading features have become well known to Disciples of Christ everywhere.

cost hundreds of dollars to repair. John A. Stevens, pastor of the church, describes the depredation as follows: "The vandals, with candles in hand, screwdrivers and scissors, and what else no one knows, did their work in a calculating, deliberate manner. It must have taken half the night to do the work.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

The most irreparable destruction was wrought on the pews, which originally cost about $900. The evident spite was gratified by a good judge of what was irreparable. The destroying of veneered scroll work on the pews was the most serious. They went down every aisle in the building destroying the finish on the pew heads. They stood in the pews and pried off and destroyed the decoration on the backs of the pews, leaving the jagged 'springs' with which the decorations were fastened." The police of course are working actively on the case, but as yet no clue has been found nor suggestions of a motive any one might possibly have for so irrational a piece of spite.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

The Bone Gap church wants a preacher half time.

We are glad to note the good condition of the work at Waukegan, Ellsworth Faris, of Chicago, minister. It is said the church has not been in so good conditon for the last eight years.

H. E. Easterling of Decatur will be available for a half time place after January 1. He has had fifty additions at Ash Grove in the last two years and continues with them another year half time.

J. D. Williams is in a good meeting at Frederick, eleven added December 3. The church had almost disbanded but Brother Williams is putting new life into it. He goes to Bader next, then to Browning.

B. S. M. Edwards has accepted the work at Clayton, and he says, "The people are feeling happy and every department is increasing in interest and attendance." Mr. Edwards was pastor there some years ago.

November was State Mission month, but if it was not convenient to take the offering then, take it later; but be sure to take it—that is the main thing. We want every preacher in the state to be a good friend of State Missions, and they ought to be on the ground of reciprocity, because this office is the preachers' friend and does a great deal for them in a great many ways during the year.

The church at Dixon, S. Elwood Fisher, minister, held their annual meeting recently and the reports were very encouraging—the old debt carried for many years is out of the way and money in the treasury. There were 91 additions to the church and Bro. Fisher is beginning his fourth year. As a token of love the church presented their minister and his wife with a handsome 26-piece silver set for Christmas.

F. L. Starbuck recently held his own meeting at McLean, where he preaches half time, with eighteen added to the church. This was really an unusually good meeting all things considered. The church is in the best condition it has enjoyed for many years. The interest on their debt and $400 of the principal was recently paid and the church is gathering power and influence in the community. New electric lights are being installed, the Sunday-school is growing and everybody full of hope.

The State Missionary offerings are coming in, a few every day but not as fast as they should, and they are mostly small. It is impossible for our Board to take hold of the most primising openings for mission work unless the churches rally to the state service with more and larger offerings. We can hardly hold the missions we are already helping, without taking on any new obligations. It is really a pity to see splendid opportunities pass, one after another, and not be able to step in and take advatage of them. We urge the ministry to kindly lay stress upon the great needs of Illinois Missions and make the offerings large as possible.

Benefits Remembered

Reports from the observance of Ministerial Relief Day, December 15th, are just beginning to come in and are most encouraging As yet it is only a beginning, for the 15th has just passed, and many churches observe the 22d to 29th instead. Then more congregations each year are following the budget plan or using duplex envelopes. But the regular receipts since October 1st, are 50 per cent ahead of the some period last year. We have a bequest of $5,000 against one of $300 then, and $953 from the Louisville Convention, more than thrice that of Portland.

The important point is that the heroic service of our veteran preachers is taken out of the list of "benefits forgot" and put among those gratefully remembered. Labors more unselfish or more fruitful of manifold blessings were never performed. We are all beneficiaries of their toil and sacrifice. As surely and as fully as we know the facts we are including the fathers in our Christmas remembrances and among our New Year creditors.

On behalf of the brotherhood the board has just made six new appropriations: two to retired missionaries; one to an aged minister and three to widows of men whose lives were gloriously fruitful. If we could tell in detail of the labor and sacrifice and harvest of souls represented in this group, the hearts of all who read would be thrilled.
